HUNTERS ON DOUBLE TRAIL

Chinese Puzzle Unravelled, Leads to Secret Cover and Chase is On

Pack Divides and Merry Runs End in Both Victory and Defeat
Many Miles Apart

GRAY SKIES and a brisk northwest wind, made the start of the week's best fox hunt gloomy and unpromising, but nothing dampens the ardor of those who truly love the chase and merrily with clank of steel, creak of leather and gay laughter the cavalcade swung out into the dim Beyond. Not long after a scent as cold as the day itself was struck, which after much twisting and circling promised success for which hounds and hunters were both keen. A Chinese puzzle it proved, for two foxes had roamed along, side by side or apart, as fancy dictated, dividing from time to time, pack and hunt.

Two hours of this novel trailing, its difficulties increased by the wind which soon effaced the scent, led to a dense swamp in which the pair were jumped, dashing away at right angles with M. F. H. Twitty and half the pack in pursuit of one and Huntsman Nat and the remainder of the dogs, after the other, with the music good to hear. Across and around the "burnt" land the knowing fox swung in attempt to end the pursuit at the very start, but still the hounds followed, gaining, and swinging round a swamp reynard planned a new campaign. Its preliminary was a dash over rough land, its climax climbing a tree, backing down and doubling quickly off, doubtless chuckling at the cleverness of the trick. Pell mell came the pack, the lust of conquest in their voices as they surrounded the tree and waited for the hunters—all but little Silas. Not quite satisfied that the chase should end so abruptly he swung wide and presently his strike cry sent the hounds flying after him.

Not just as reynard anticipated had the theory worked out, but it had given him a lead which made clever maneuvering possible, and a merry trail he laid in a three mile dash over field and hillside to golf links and off to Fishing creek. Here another clever double gave on additional breathing spell,
