MIXED FOURSOMES

Engage Attention of Tin Whistles

A record field of 128 players contested in the Tin Whistles annual Mixed Foursomes tournament played on Thursday last. Mrs. Dorothy Campbell Hurd, who won the Silver Foils championship the day before, and Parker W. Whittemore, winner of the Spring tournament, were paired together and led the field with a gross score of 38-45-83. Whittemore and Mrs. Hurd were paired together in the same event two years ago and established a record for such events when they played alternate strokes and turned in a card of 39-37-76. H. C. Fownes, 2nd, and Mrs. Ronald H. Barlow were second in the gross scores with 45-39-84.

Mr. and Mrs. R. C. Blanke, playing with a handicap of 27, finished in 104-27-77, and won first prize in the net scores division, followed by A. D. Fisher and Miss Jane Herron, at 103-23-80. Six pairs covered the course in 81 net and tied for third prize, these being W. W. Windle and Mrs. John Fitzgerald, W. E. Truesdell and Mrs. Donald J. Ross, J. M. Robinson and Miss Louise Emery, R. C. Shannon and Miss Dorothy Richards, S. Y. Ramage and Mrs. Joseph Bydolek, and Mr. and Mrs. F. T. Keating.

The large field finished in the following order:

APPARENT INCONSISTENCIES IN GOLF

BY JACK HOAG

The hardest task which a golf instructor faces is to find the language which will convey the correct idea to his pupil and this is particularly true where the suggestions are written and the pupil lacks an instructor to illustrate the stroke. Each golfer puts a different construction on what he reads and the mental picture which two golfers have after reading the description of a stroke is often so different as to be quite unrecognizable.

When the average man reads that a golf stroke should be fast but never hurried, firm but never tense, and powerful but relaxed, he is quite apt to remark, "That writer is crazy," and give the subject no further thought and yet a real athlete would understand that it is possible to execute a movement (Play a stroke,) and yet comply with the above requirements to the letter.

A golf stroke must be played firmly to secure any degree of success, and yet there must be no tenseness of muscles and the whole body must be relaxed. To reach the scratch mark a player must combine both direction and length in his stroke, and this can only be done by a perfect blending of the two great principals in golf. Distance depends on relaxation and speed and direction on the control of the club, so it stands to reason that you have to sacrifice something of the one to secure the other.

At the start the player should concentrate on direction and leave the question of length to take care of itself as it will surely do as the player's game develops. We hesitate to state that many experienced golfers use too much wrist action in their shots for the reason that it will make many beginners try to hit the ball with the wrists held tensely, and this in turn will put too much body into the stroke; but the fact remains that good direction is impossible where the wrists are permitted to flop around loosely, and the same thing applies to a loose grip.

The hands must grip the club firmly and the wrists must be firm at the time of impact in all iron play or the club is liable to turn in your hands when the club head hits the ground and all sense of direction is lost. At the same time there must be nothing stiff and wooden about the stroke. Tenseness spoils almost as many shots as are ruined by sloppy play, and this is particularly true of recovery work.

Watch the average player in a bunker, see him spread his feet out, take a
