We're "up a tree" to build a better tomorrow

Think about the future when you see one of our men high up on a power pole. We're heavying up our power lines now to meet the booming demand for power that is developing throughout the rural areas. Here's what's happening: Our rural electric system started out by supplying mainly farms and homes. We still do. But the great migration of Americans into rural areas has increased the need for rural electricity beyond all expectations. Now we supply many more homes plus schools, churches, rural businesses, and industrial plants. We're happy to serve our community well to help it grow and prosper. All of this means more demand for electricity, more and heavier power lines... and a better tomorrow for rural people who are served by our rural electric system.
