YOUR FUTURE

To make the most money possible, a farmer should know exactly what it costs him to produce each thing he markets. And, to know his production costs, the farmer should keep a good set of books. Wallace, secretary of agriculture, makes this point in a speech before the Institute of American Meat Packers.

It is true of each individual, no matter what we do for a living.

The average farmer, in common with nearly everybody else, works on the "law of averages." He makes money on some of his products, loses on others. At some time of the year, generally when the month's obligations at the bank, he knows whether it has been a profitable year or not, but has only a hazy notion of what lines have been profitable and what unprofitable.

The average business man, too, is inclined to be in much the same boat. Then, with the adoption of scientific book-keeping, Mr. Business Man has a few unprofitable lines—and dropped them. He has also found out what was making him money—and increased his production in that direction.

There is such a thing as getting on a "book-keeping." Many a business goes wrong, not to the point where there are as many keeping books as there are producing. Failure lies ahead.

But book-keeping, in its proper sense, is indispensable in modern times.

Book-keeping shows us where we are making money and where we are losing it—what to do and what not to do.

In the case of individuals, a simple set of books will strikingly bring home the many lessons that are keeping us from getting ahead. With this knowledge, one can go on a budget system, one knows where to limit expenditures, and one can live within one's income and lay away so much money for savings and investment.
