CHARLES LEE INGRAM

The Journal joins with the people of Macon county in mourning the passing of Charles L. Ingram, distinguished citizen of our neighbor county. The tragic circumstances connected with the passing of Mr. Ingram but accentuate the loss to Macon county and Western North Carolina of so excellent a man.

For many years Mr. Ingram had been a useful public servant. As postmaster, as sheriff of the county, and in his latest capacity as representative in the General Assembly, he served his people conscientiously and well.

The writer knew him best as a member of the House, having sat by his side in that chamber through four and a half months of the most trying sessions of recent history of the North Carolina legislature.

No county in the State had a more fearless, honest or courageous representative than was Charlie Ingram. He was devoted to his duty and to the interests of the farmers and the laboring people of North Carolina. The expression: "the commonality of the people" was frequently on his lips; and the weal of the people who make their bread in the sweat of their faces was ever uppermost in his thoughts. It was their welfare that dictated every utterance that he made and every vote that he cast.

Charlie Ingram was true as steel—true to his people who had elected him, true to his convictions; and once he had made up his mind as to what policy would best serve his beloved folks, no power on earth could swerve him from his course.

The writer feels a keen personal loss in the tragic death of Sheriff Ingram. No one can be closely associated with a man of the type of Macon's representative for a period of weeks, without learning to love and admire him.

SCHOOLS

There has been much pother throughout North Carolina, ever since the convening of the General Assembly, in January, over the public school system of the State.

There was a large school of thought in the State that believed that it would be necessary to curtail the school term to four months, or to discontinue them altogether during the present biennium. Another large faction, backed by the North Carolina Education Association, insisted that salaries and other appropriations should be kept at their then present level.

Between these two was a middle course, backed by a common sense that saw the condition in which the people of North Carolina found themselves, due to the general depressed conditions in the business world, and, at the same time saw the utter wreckage that would result to the school system of the State, so laboriously built through a period of many years, should a vacation of two years be declared, or should the term be cut to four months.

This latter school of thought finally prevailed, in a large measure, in the General Assembly. Its adherents believed in seizing the opportunity to establish a State system of public schools, granting equal educational advantages to the children of North Carolina, and spreading the costs of operation over the entire State. This saved the schools in many counties. It provided better schools in many other counties than would have been possible under any other plan. The men who took this view will prove, in the end, to have been the real friends of the schools, the real friends of the children, the real friends of the school teachers, and the true friends of the tax-payers of the State. They reduced the appropriations and the tax levies for schools, and, at the same time, made provision that insures a school for every child, and a salary, perhaps reduced, but still a salary that will be paid, for every teacher. Either for the other courses would have resulted in inevitable disaster to the school system of North Carolina.

With a foundation laid for a real State-wide, State-supported school system, North Carolina can build thereon a system of public education that will be worthy of the State, without overburdening the taxpayers in any county or any district. On the other hand, the burden upon the taxpayers has been materially lightened, and the State has appropriated all that the people could afford to pay for school purposes, under present conditions.
