"The computer depersonalizes the creative output of a person or group of people," Moore said.

But there might be relief for some student listeners if Napster is not completely shut down and users have to pay a minimal fee to download music.

As a result of the new fee, Napster would not be the same for many users.

Some students also believe that Napster is beneficial to artists and the new ruling might be a mistake.

Adams also said musicians already make an exorbitant amount of money. "I don't like it because it is just sharing and artists make enough money," he said.

Although varying opinions have erupted over the Napster ruling, sophomore Candice Fisher feels the ruling was bound to happen.

occurred in District 3 with all four candidates snagging one vote for the single congressional seat, will be decided in next Tuesday's runoff election.

No votes were cast for the two empty congressional seats in District 9, and those empty seats will be filled in a special election for which the date has not been decided.

Gregory Wahl, chairman of the current session's Student Affairs Committee, said he believes the lack of interest is because membership requires hard, largely unpublicized work.

He said only five of this session's members are expected to return, and last year only three members came back for another year of office.

by an elected committee that represents students, parents and faculty, where it received "unanimous support."

School board member Elizabeth Carter said the board was in support of the waiver when it was proposed last year and that she thinks that it could only help the students.

Some private schools, such as N.C. School of Science and Math, are not required by the state to use the N.C. Student Information Management system.

If granted, the waiver will directly

The large number of new members also will make elections for Congress speaker and committee chairmen very unpredictable, Wahl said.

"It's based a lot on first impression," he said. "But the returning members are the only ones likely to win."

Wahl and Mark Townsend, chairman of this session's Finance Committee, are the only two declared candidates for speaker.

The next session will vote on a new speaker during its opening session in April.

Wahl also noted that graduate students are particularly hard hit by the lack of interest.

Although 12 of Congress' 37 seats go to graduate students, Wahl said graduate students are too busy and aren't affected enough by Congress' actions to want to participate.

affect next year's graduating class. Students' class ranks will be eliminated from their transcripts when they apply to college.

Thaden said not including class rank on student transcripts will ensure a more fair college admission process.

"We have a lot of qualified kids. We hope that they won't be examined as just a percentage."

"Nationally we only get 48 percent voter turnout, so it would be a stretch then to think we'd ever get more than half of the student population."

"A lot of the student groups on the graduate level believe they got shafted," he said. "When they ask for $2,000 and get nothing because they don't have any representatives, it's understandable."

But Wahl remains optimistic that Tuesday's election eccentricities will be dealt with more efficiently than the U.S. presidential elections were in November.

"It won't take as long as Florida, that's for sure."
