Roadside Markets Urged By Knapp

The roadside market is a potential source of considerable profit to farmers who are situated so they can take advantage of it, points out Dr. Joseph G. Knapp, associate agricultural economist at State College.

North Carolina farmers, he said, would do well to follow in the footsteps of growers in Massachusetts and New Jersey, where roadside marketing has been developed to a high degree and associations formed to insure the public of quality produce and full weights and measures.

Next in importance to high grade produce and honest measures are attractive markets and courteous and intelligent service. The public likes to stop at inviting places, but passes by those which look shoddy and unbusinesslike.

Take a tip from the experience of filling stations, Dr. Knapp advises. Observe how the modern, high class places get the business, while the "joints" gradually go into bankruptcy.

The location of a roadside market is also important. It should be convenient for the motorists, and visible for some distance in both directions. Motorists travelling fast are not inclined to jam on their brakes to stop at a place that flashes suddenly into view.

The top of a hill or the outside of a mild curve have the advantage of getting the drivers attention while he has slowed down. The best location, however, is undoubtedly a straight road. The right side of the road going into town is also best, for more produce is purchased by people returning to the city than by those leaving it.

Plenty of good parking space is also essential. Some attractive flowers or natural foliage will enhance the appearance of a market place. An inexpensive but attractive stand can be built for a few dollars. Sometimes a few display racks under a shade tree will suffice.

Signs several hundred feet or more down the road on each side of the market will help draw attention. A few words are best, such as "Fresh Fruits and Vegetables for Sale," or "Sunshine Road Market Just Ahead."

Farm Questions And Answers

Question: Present prices of eggs do not justify feeding my entire flock. What should be done?

Answer: The flock should be culled and all low producing birds taken from the flock and sold. A number of birds in all flocks are now becoming unprofitable and this number will increase as the season advances. The broody birds should be removed. The practice of culling will materially lower the feed bill. Extension Circular No. 156 on "How to Cull" explains the method in detail and copies will be mailed free on application to F. H. Jeter, agricultural editor at State College.

Question: When should crimson clover and hairy vetch be turned under for best results?

Answer: As a general rule crimson clover is not ready to turn under until about the first of May. In all cases, however, the crop should be turned under by the time it is in full bloom. Vetch should also be turned under at the full blooming stage which is usually about ten days after crimson clover. If plowed in too late the succeeding crops will not receive the full benefit the first year.
