HANNAH MOSELEY

There is a new ornamental pear variety which created a good deal of interest during the annual meeting of the North Carolina Nurserymen's Association in January. The name of the variety is Bradford and it was selected by USDA scientists.

Dr. Edward Corbett, a USDA research horticulturist, stationed at the U. S. Plant Introduction Station, Glen Dale, Md., showed beautiful color slides of trees in bloom and leaf coloration in the fall.

This relatively new ornamental tree has prolific and beautiful white flowers; silvery, glossy green foliage in summer changing to crimson to dark red in the fall; the fruits are few, russet colored and inconspicuous. They hold on well into the winter (in the South) and are said to be attractive to birds; growth habit is upright, compact and non-thorny; it is hardy and resistant to fire blight and other common pear diseases.

When mature, Bradford reaches a height of about 50 feet. It appears that this tree would be desirable as a specimen plant in a large yard. It might also be attractive planted on both sides of a road leading into an estate. It is also recommended for street planting where it will not compete with utility wires.

I know of two possible sources of nursery stock and will send you the addresses if you wish to try this new ornamental variety...

Hear ye! Hear ye! It's that time again - man's never ending battle against insect and disease pests. Aphid eggs are ready to crack and insects of all kinds are poised to wake up from their deep winter sleep and bop you one.

And that ain't all. The diseases are also ready to break out of winter quarters and shoot more disease spores at you than you can get from a battery of 20 gauge shotguns loaded with number nine bird shot. They are even waited lazily on the breezes that come our way from Florida, stopping off at all stations to deploy a few million disease spores. The jet age is old hick to these spores because they were around long before the Wright Brothers discovered Kitty Hawk.

And so, you be prepared: spray or dust regularly; use the right materials at the proper time; spray thoroughly covering both sides of the leaves.

Read the label, and observe the usual precautions when handling and applying pesticides.
