Fabric Softeners Prove Beneficial

RALEIGH—Fabric softeners are good wash day news for homemakers, especially if you line-dry rather than tumble-dry your clothes. But before you reach for that bottle of fabric softener note some precautions.

You'll get the most benefit from softeners by using them properly, extension home management specialists, North Carolina State University, point out.

Add at the start of the final rinse, and dilute with water since dyes used in some softeners may discolor fabrics if applied full strength.

Adding softener with detergent or bleach cancels the action of the softener, and may impair cleaning.

Warm rinse water, 90 degrees and above, insures the great softening action.

Use the amount suggested on the label for full loads. If you're washing smaller loads, decrease the amount of softener in proportion to the size of the load.

The softener works by coating fibers with a waxy substance. This has its drawbacks as well as advantages: absorbency is decreased.

To counteract this, leave out softener occasionally; every fifth load or so, especially when laundering towels and diapers.

There are limits to what softeners can do. Ironing will be easier because of the waxy coating, but don't expect softeners to decrease wrinkling.

And some color change may result from frequent use of fabric softeners.

Continued use of softeners reduces static cling of synthetics.

Case To Be Tried

The Matter of the Will and Codicil of R. P. Perkinson, scheduled to be tried at the October Civil Term of Warren County Superior Court will be heard at the January Term of Court, according to a letter to Coley Perkinson of Warrenton from Charles M. Davis of the law firm of Davis and Sturges of Lenoir.

In his letter, Davis stated: "Because of the length of the trial, Judge Brewer continued the case until the January term of Court, at which time it will be set as the first case for trial."

In reporting action of the court last week, this newspaper stated:

"In the Matter of the Will and Codicil of R. P. Perkinson, deceased, the plaintiffs withdrew the caveat filed to the will and codicil and agreed to the will and codicil being probated." The order was signed by Coy Brewer, presiding judge.

The confusion resulted in that only a part of the defendants involved as plaintiffs withdrew the caveat, and Judge Brewer's order affected only those plaintiffs.
