Friends Common Among Children

By MRS. BERTHA B. FORTE
Home Extension Agent

If your little one suddenly announces the arrival of a make-believe friend, don't be upset. Imaginary friends are common among the two to five set—especially when they need help coping with a particular situation.

If a child is left behind when playmates are in school—or if there's nobody else to play with—a child often makes up a friend.

Sometimes children use make-believe companions to get extra attention. Or preschoolers may invent friends as a tool for learning more about themselves. For instance, talking to a make-believe playmate can help children learn to express feelings in words.

Some imaginary friends stay for a long time. Others leave within a few days. But whatever the length of stay, parents need to stay calm—accept the friend—and listen to the child.

Try to decide why the make-believe playmate arrived. Then decide if you want to take action. If your child wants to spend more time with you—involve the youngster in your daily activities. If the child needs a good listener—be a good listener.

Once the need causing the arrival of the imaginary friend is filled—your youngster will no longer need the imaginary playmate. And someday that make-believe person won't be around anymore.
