Food Among First Sacrifice Of The Hard-Pressed Elderly

"Elderly persons often must survive on a small pension they receive monthly and in many cases food is among one of the first items cut back to save money, Mrs. Billie Fleming, outreach coordinator for food stamps, said this week.

"This is the reason, she said, that older residents of Warren County have been targeted for special attention in the Food Stamp program.

"We think there are many elderly persons in our county who either do not know they qualify for food stamps or won't apply for them because they think it's a welfare program," Mrs. Fleming explained. "We want to reach these people. Most folks on fixed incomes with few additional resources would qualify for food stamps."

"What we would like to emphasize," Mrs. Fleming said, "is that participation in this program is no different from receiving other benefits designed and deserved by the elderly such as Social Security, Supplemental Security Insurance, tax breaks, etc. The Food Stamp Program is not even a welfare program because people actually pay for the stamps. There should be no stigma associated with the use of the stamps and no hesitation to apply."

The program is used to stretch the food dollar to insure good nutrition. Most of the elderly on fixed incomes really need the extra food the program can provide to stay healthy.

"Nutrition is a recognized problem of the elderly," says Nathan Yelton, Assistant Secretary for the Division on Aging under the Department of Human Resources. "I am extremely distressed at the low rate of participation of those on fixed incomes who use food stamps. Elderly people can realize a tremendous benefit from this program both by improving their budget and their health." He continued that the Division on Aging would encourage food stamp usage through various private and government agencies that serve older adults.

John Kerr, Head of the Food Stamp Program in North Carolina, plans to promote participation of the elderly statewide. "Hunger is the most degrading among all of the adversities the low income elderly suffers," he said. "It would seem to demonstrate a shameful inability of our culture to satisfy this most fundamental human necessity and implies society's neglect of the elderly. County departments of social services across the state are making a special effort to reach out and offer this benefit to our senior citizens."
