Garden Sprayer Needs Cleaning At Each Use

Proper care of your garden duster or sprayer will keep it in working condition and extend its life.

North Carolina State University extension specialists suggest that dusting equipment should need no maintenance as long as it is kept dry, although it might be a good idea to put a drop of oil on the plunger rod occasionally.

Sprayers require more care—particularly cleaning care. Even stainless steel sprayers need this attention.

The sprayers should be washed out three times after each use, using clear water. This will prevent the corrosion that often renders pressure sprayers useless after only a few seasons.

For metal sprayer tanks, put in a tablespoonful of household ammonia and shake it thoroughly to neutralize the corrosive effects of any insecticide residue. Allow the sprayer to completely dry, then lightly oil the plunger rod and replace it in the tank.

It is particularly important that gardeners not use the same sprayer for herbicides (weed killers) as they do for insecticides. If you use liquid weed killers, you will need a separate sprayer for that job alone.

It is almost impossible to remove 100 per cent of the herbicide residue from tank, hose and nozzle, and this tiny bit of herbicide residue could severely damage plants when the same tank is used for an insecticide.

Sprayers used for herbicides require thorough cleaning to prevent corrosion. Many of the herbicides contain salts that are very corrosive to metals. Also, be careful where you clean these sprayers. Cleaning water shouldn't be poured where it can damage plants or lawn grasses.
