Prepare Plants For Moving

Tips for the landscape gardener:

Plants can be prepared now for moving during the fall and winter dormant seasons, suggest North Carolina State University agricultural extension horticulturists.

If you have plants that will be moved later, the specialists suggest root pruning them now. Use a sharp spade. Cut around the plant and into the outer roots.

Many of these roots would be lost in the moving process, so it is better to cut them off now and allow the plant to adjust to the loss before it is moved.

Another timely reminder relates to watering shallow-rooted shrubs. Plants such as camellias and azaleas don't put down deep roots. This makes them susceptible to damage during dry weather. Another reason they need water is that they are continuing to develop flower buds at this time.

Don't fertilize these plants with nitrogen now. It's too late for this season. Feeding them nitrogen now would cause a spurt of new growth. This tender vegetable would not have time to harden off by the onset of cold weather, making it highly vulnerable to damage.

Save Water

When use of a garbage disposal is necessary, save food scraps and run the disposal once to conserve water. You can use the disposal even less by saving food scraps for a compost pile.
