Cuba Is Behind Much Trouble In Latin America, Solon Says

By REP. L. H. FOUNTAIN
WASHINGTON, D. C. —
" . . . When we found out that Cuba, a country with which we had diplomatic relations, was using those relations to prepare a group of guerrillas to come and fight against the government, it was a kind of Pearl Harbor for us. It was like sending ministers to Washington at the same time you are about to bomb ships in Hawaii."

Those words, spoken only last August by President Turbay of Colombia, South America, illustrate all too clearly the real intentions of Communist Cuba toward Colombia, and toward a good portion of the rest of South and Central America.

Since coming to power in Cuba over 20 years ago, Castro has tried to spread Cuba's influence in any way possible throughout Latin America. But, since 1978, Castro's plans appear to have become more daring, more violent and more dangerous.

This latest round of meddling started with Cuba's backing of the Marxist-oriented Sandinistas — the group which is systematically crushing freedoms in Nicaragua. The Cubans have also helped organize terror and subversion in El Salvador, Guatemala, Costa Rica, Honduras, Jamaica, Guyana, Grenada, the Dominican Republic, Columbia, Chile, Argentina, and Uruguay.

With this sort of widespread support for violence and terror, it is clear that Cuba poses a serious threat to peace in the region as well as an ultimate threat to the United States. For instance, if all or most of Central America was to come under the dominating influence of Castro's Cuba, U. S. access to the Panama Canal, Caribbean sea lanes, oil and other vital raw materials could be endangered. Cuba would be sitting astride our southern raw material lifeline.

Under the new strategy, Cuba is contacting splinter radical groups in individual Latin American countries and attempting to unite those in each country for the violent overthrow of that particular government.

When Castro's henchmen have united the radicals of, say, Honduras, those radicals are then promised arms and training; and they are often flown to Cuba for that training—training which puts them squarely under the thumb of Communist Cuba.

According to the State Department, this Cuban strategy has, among other things: trained radicals in urban and guerrilla warfare, supplied weapons to Cuban-trained units to take power by force, encouraged terrorism, and used military aid and advisers to gain even more influence over guerrilla groups.

In fact, Cuba now has over 5,000 advisers in Nicaragua and at least 1,500 of them are security and military experts who are providing everything from combat training to Gestapo-like secret police instruction.

Of course, Cuba would be ill-equipped to provide this aid to radicals without the massive support of the Soviet Union. A country with a stagnant economy, coupled with ruthless suppression of freedom, Cuba could not itself survive without the $8 million which flows in daily from Russia.

Nevertheless, this sort of Cuban influence peddling cannot be allowed to continue unchecked. Of necessity, the responsible governments of Latin America must find a solution to this cancerous problem.

Beyond question, our own economic lifeline to vital raw materials such as bauxite and tin depends, in large part, on our Latin American neighbors. As I've said before, what happens politically in other nations can affect us economically here at home.

And frankly, whether we agree with all the policies of every pro-Western government of Latin America or not, we must support their legitimate governments as best we can — the alternative is complete Soviet control of Latin America through their puppets in Communist Cuba.

And while there are legitimate grievances which many governments of Central and South America must address, the thought of Latin America being run from Moscow through Havana should not be acceptable to them and is most assuredly not acceptable to us.
