Variety Selection Is Key Ingredient

Variety selection is one of the key elements in successful home vegetable gardening, suggest N. C. Agricultural Extension Service horticulturists.

Seed are sold at hundreds of retail outlets of all types. Most of the seed are pre-packaged for a national or regional market. Some of these seed may not be adapted to North Carolina, but many often get planted in Tar Heel soil — with disappointing results.

One way to avoid this grief is to use the Home Garden Vegetable Planting Guide prepared by the N. C. Agricultural Extension Service. This guide, which is updated each year, is available free at county agricultural extension offices.

Probably the most important information in the guide is the list of suggested varieties of over 40 vegetables that are best suited for North Carolina growing conditions. The guide will also give you favored planting and maturity dates.

Which tomato to plant?

There are several good choices for Tar Heel gardeners. Two that carry resistance to some of the common wilt diseases are Whipper (VFN) and Better Boy (VFN). Some good long-time favorites are Manapal and Marion.

Every gardener has a favorite variety of sweet corn. Senneca Chief, the small yellow variety, is one of the most widely planted in the state. Another is a white variety Silver Queen. Two other good ones are Earlicking and White Delight.

Clemson spineless and Emerald continue to rank high as okra varieties. Top choices of the pole beans are Kentucky Wonder 191, Dade and Blue Lake. If you want to tellis your green beans, the favorite bush types include Tenderette, Harvester, Astro and a flat bean, Roma.

For bush limas it's Fordhook 242, Henderson Bush and Early Thoroughgreen; pole limas, King of the Garden and Sieva, a small bean.

Information of other vegetable varieties is available from local county offices of the N. C. Agricultural Extension Service and from reputable garden retailers.
