

Cabbage For Sour Kraut

One good way to save the surplus of cabbage now found in many home gardens is to convert the cabbage into sauerkraut for use this winter. The kraut is wholesome and palatable and will be a welcome addition to the winter diet.

"Sauerkraut is no more than shredded cabbage that has undergone a lactic fermentation in brine made from its own juice by the addition of salt," says Mary Thomas, nutrition specialist at State College. "Some people like the kraut better than they do the original cabbage. It supplies several of the essential minerals necessary for human nutrition and the lactic acid which it contains is a good tonic refreshing the digestive tract much as does buttermilk. Almost any variety of cabbage may be used for the kraut but the slow growing, solid headed varieties are best. The cabbage should be fully matured before it is cut for kraut."

Miss Thomas says the 4 to 6 gallon stone jars are best for kraut making. Select good, sound heads of cabbage, quarter them, slice off the core and shred. A slaw cutter or a large knife will do for this work. One pound of salt for every 40 pounds of cabbage gives the proper strength of brine for best results. Distribute the salt as the cabbage is packed into the stone jar. Distributing two ounces or four tablespoonsful to every five pounds of cabbage is probably the best way, she says. The cabbage must be packed firmly but not too tightly, covered with a clean cloth and a clean board with a weight on it to cause the brine to come up over the cover.

Keep this jar at a temperature of about 86 degrees so that fermentation may take place. Skim off the scum from time to time and fermentation will be completed in from six to days. Now put the jar or keg in a cool place. It may be necessary to keep the surface skimmed and to protect from insects. If the storage place is cool, there is little danger from spoilage.

STATE FARM CONVENTION

OPENS ON AUGUST 29.

With an advanced registration of some 2,000 persons indicated, the annual State Farmers' Convention which opens at State College on Monday, August 29, bids fair to be one of the most interesting of recent years, announces Charles A. Sheffield, secretary.

An interesting group of speakers has been secured among whom are Dr. R. B. House of Chapel Hill, United States Senator J. W. Bailey, Representative Lindsay Warren, Hon. David R. Coker of South Carolina, Mrs. Ethel J. Hammond of Massachusetts, Mrs. E. L. McKee of Sylva, Dr. E. C. Brooks of State College, and a number of expert specialists for the sectional programs. A larger number of North Carolina farmers and farm women have been secured for places on the program to give practical suggestions about improved farm and home methods.

Mr. Snefield says there will be a general meeting for women. The joint meetings will be held each evening on the campus after supper. At these joint meetings, no dry technical subjects will be discussed but the delegates will enjoy a period of recreation and community singing followed by inspirational addresses from the invited speakers.

The convention opens formally Tuesday morning at 10:30 o'clock with the presidential addresses by W. Warren Watson of Hyde County, president of the convention, and by Mrs. D. A. McCormick of Robeson County, president of the State Federation of Home Demonstration Clubs. The annual short course for farm women will be held as usual with presentation of certificates on Friday morning. A number of interesting contests, demonstrations and trips have been arranged for the visitors.

A special feature this year will be the study of small farm organizations especially mutual exchanges.

TYPES OF GARDEN ROSES

There are four classes of roses widely grown in gardens in America. First, the American and Asiatic wild rose types, which are grown as shrubs and which are perfectly hardy without protection; second, the hybrid perpetuals, often called June roses and cabbage roses, which blossom once in June and once in the fall and are quite hardy but need some protection in Northern states; third, the hybrid teas, called monthly or everlasting roses, which are not hardy where the winters are at all severe, and need perfect protection in the winters in the Northern states; and fourth, the hardy climbers, including multiflora and polyantha, bunch-flowering types, and the hybrid wichu-rianas.

This is a rough classification and does not purport to include everything, but is sufficient to guide you in getting a start with roses.

The first thing to decide, as in the case with any flowers you may buy, is where you will put them in your garden. The rose shrubs will grow in your shrubby border and some of the hybrid perpetuals may be grown there if you do not wish to prune them and try for specimen flowers but desire rather a great bush with many and small blossoms.

But other types of roses do not like close company; they object to the roots of trees and shrubs and thrive best in beds by themselves. Hardy climbers do well climbing on lattice fences, against building walls and in perpetual borders, where they are often grown, but the hybrid teas and the June roses, when they are to be pruned and grown for specimen flowers, should be in beds by themselves. This characteristic of roses is the reason for the garden where roses only are grown. In the rose garden the most satisfactory showing is made by the hybrid teas or the everblooming types. They have delicate pointed buds on strong stems and brilliant colors, Ophelia, a delicate salmon flesh tint; Radnee, a rosy carmine; Red Radiance, a brilliant red; Mrs. Aaron Ward, a yellow; Los Angeles, pink shaded with gold and Kaiserin, white tinted with lemon, are some of the hybrid teas which are considered among the best. If one grows hybrid teas in the Northern states he must be prepared to do one of two things—either to treat them as annuals and buy new plants each year, which is not expensive, or to give them perfect winter protection, without which they are likely to die in the cold weather states.

Climbing roses of the hardy types blossom in June and sometimes again in the fall; but they are so beautiful when in flower that a garden without them seems to be lacking. There is nothing to equal them for the arbor and pillar which make such striking garden accents. For abundance of bloom no plant excels varieties such as Exceelsa and Dorothy Perkins, which bear their flowers in clusters.

Besides these, Paul's scarlet climber, climbing American Beauty and Dr. W. Van Fleet are considered to be among our best climbers.
