The Typewriter

the same unconscious process simply because they did not learn typing in the junior classes at school.

Of course, as before mentioned there are some who have acquired the art of "thinking on a typewriter," but these are by no means as numerous as might be expected considering the advantages of the machine over the pen, speed and legibility.

It occurs to one to ask whether there is any reason why the typewriter should not be taught in the lower grades at school. Expense of provide the machines is possibly the sole obstacle. The following from an exchange is illuminating: "Recently an experiment was undertaken to discover if the use of the typewriter would influence the progress of pupils in the school work of Grades I to VI. While the results are not reported in figures, it is said the pupils were enthusiastic about the innovation, that with only informal instruction they soon learned to type faster than they could write with pencil, and that the teachers testified 'to the improvement of the children's written work, to the development of self-confidence on the part of some of the slower pupils, and to the generally favorable influence on the children's attitude.' The use of the typewriters increased the production of written work, and in four of the six grades, children who used the machines did better work in the regular school work than those who used pen and pencil."

Dissolve a genuine Bayer Aspirin

fine powder that coats the glass.

Do this with some other tablet;
see what coarse particles are left!
They feel as sharp as sand, even to your finger. How must they affect those delicate membranes which line
your throat—your stomach?

For immediate relief from head-

there's nothing like Bayer Aspirin.
It cannot depress the heart.
