Should daffodils and tulips be taken up each year and when should this be done?

This is a perennial question after the blooming season of spring-flowering bulbs is over. Daffodils need not be taken up each year but should be taken up, divided, and replanted every three or four years in order to give them more room to grow and reproduce. It is best to take them up when the foliage is green, the plant is storing food materials in the bulbs for next year's bloom. After the foliage has turned yellow the bulbs may be dug, divided and replanted at once, or may be dried and stored in a cool dry place over summer and planted in the fall.

Tulips should be taken up and replanted at least every second year. In our Tar Heel climate the bulbs deteriorate rapidly and should be replaced by new ones if large flowers are desired. As in the case of daffodils, tulips should not be taken up until the tops turn yellow and begin to die.

Bearded iris (German iris) are blooming now and will be ready to divide and replant in about a month after the blooming period is over. However, they may be divided any time during the summer or early fall. A good division consists of a new rhizome or thickened underground stem with a cluster or fan of leaves. The true roots originate from the bottom of this rhizome. In replanting the division the rhizome should be planted so that the top of it will be about even with the top of the soil. Deep planting is not desirable. Bearded iris do best in well-drained soils that dry out quickly.
