The Rudiments of Conservation: Protect, Preserve, Propagate and Plant

By ALEXANDER MACDONALD, N. Y. Conservation Commi

of benefits with a minimum of waste. Applied to our natural resources, it means their utilization with regard to the future and the generations that are to come after us. They have been given to us in abundance for use, but not for destruction or extermi-

Serious inroads had been made upon our natural resources before it was borne in upon us that they are not inexhaustible. Carelessness, waste and prodigality had reduced our forests and decimated the wild life of our fields and streams before the need of conserving them began to impress us. Much of our wild life was gone-before an intelligent effort was made to save it; the same is true of our forests.

The intelligent use of 2,000,000 acres of our forest reserve supplies a wilderness playground where all the people of the state can enjoy healthful recreation with no restrictions other than those required for the necessary protection of this great common property.

The subject of conversation is broad and of vital importance to all of us, but its rudiments may be taught in four words: Protect, preserve, propagate and plant.

Protect our forests from fire and disease. The utmost care in the of fire in the woods is enjoined upon every one.

Preserve our forests and wild life that the benefits we enjoy therefrom may be enjoyed in like measure by those who come after us. Propagate valuable species of wild life to prevent their extermination.

Plant and this is of paramount importance—forests on every available acre of idle land, because forests form the keystone of the conservation arch. Upon them depends the conservation of our streams and our wild life. Without forests there would be nothing to conserve.

Duty of the Elder Generation to Provide for the Child an Education

By JULIA LATHROP, Former Chief of Federal Bureau,

Great discoveries already have made physically possible universal comfort and refinement of life, though we are not yet skilled enough to insure equitably those living conditions which may afford the children of every family a fair start in life. Our laws and actions lag behind the attainments science already has made possible. What is now almost common knowledge of the laws of health and sanitation fills volumes-what we neglect to do in obedience to these laws would fill larger volumes.

From the census of 1920, we learn that one-third of our population is under sixteen years—12,500,000 children are between ten years and fifteen. Of those 1,060,858 are at work and over one-third of all those at work are under thirteen years of age.

The theory of child-labor restriction is a doctrine which leads far. It applies to every child of every race. It tolerates no exceptions or exemptions from the duty of the elder generation to provide for every child an education which shall develop his powers and give him a fair chance in the world of tomorrow.
