AMERICAN LABORER BETTER OFF THAN ANY OTHER

A new era for labor has been reached in the United States, he declared,—the era of the educated workman. He said that within the past few years educated Americans have been turning more and more to the manual and mechanical trades and that progress is being made away from the fetish of the white collar job.

Referring again to the late president, Mr. Davis said Harding's faith in the equality of worker and employer in industry based on intelligent craftsmanship and intelligent management, was strikingly illustrated during the coal strike of 1922 when a mixed delegation of some sixty operators and miners met with him at the white house.

"As he looked about him at the men who stood in a scattered group, he said, with that kindly smile of which endeared him to all who knew him: 'Men, except for some of you whom I know personally, I cannot tell who here are the operators and who are the workers.' Then, with a nod of satisfaction, he added: 'And this is as it should be.'"

"Truly Divine Providence guides the destinies of our nation," said Secretary Davis. "For President Harding for the first time in our history, called the vice president into the councils of the executive branch of the government, and Calvin Coolidge comes to his task knowing in detail the problems which confront him. He has been from the first, part and part of the administrative machinery of the government, and he has sat with the president and his cabinet constantly during his more than two years of service as vice president. . . . America will find in him not alone brain and conscience to lead, but a kindly heart to help. He will be a true friend of the American workman, for he has known hard work all his life. He will follow no wild phantasies in search for the millennium, no will-o'-the-wisp of thoughtless experiment. He will move forward step by step, guided by the light of progress, by experience and by studious reasoning. He preaches the gospel of the square deal, and in whatever lies before him he can be depended upon to be just fair and kindly."
