"It Was a Drop From the Heart of Christ Upon a Sin-Frozen World"

By S. HALL YOUNG, in "Alaska Days With John Muir."

HERE was no Love apparent on that bleak, gray morning: Power was there in appalling force (at the foot of Muir glacier). . . . We could not enjoy; we could only endure. Death from overturning icebergs, from charging tides, from mountain avalanches, threatened us.

Suddenly I heard Muir catch his breath with a fervent ejaculation. "God, Almighty" he said. Following his gaze toward Mt. Crillon, I saw the summit highest of all crowned with glory indeed. It was not sunlight; there was no appearance of shining; it was as if the Great Artist with one sweep of His brush had laid upon the king-peak of all a crown of the most brilliant of all colors—as if a pigment, perfectly made and thickly spread, too delicate for crimson, too intense for pink, had leaped in a moment upon the mountain top—"An awful rose of dawn." The summit nearest heaven had caught a glimpse of its glory! It was a rose blooming in ice-fields, a love-song in the midst of a stern epic, a drop from the heart of Christ upon the icy desolation and barren affections of a sin-frozen world. . . . Now as we watched that kingly peak, we saw the color leap to one and another and another of the snowy summits around it. The monarch had a whole family of royal princes about him to share his glory. Their radiant heads, ruby crowned, were above the clouds, which seemed to form their silken garments.

As we looked in ecstatic silence we saw the light creep down the mountains. It was changing now. The glowing crimson was suffused with soft, creamy light. If it was less divine, it was more warmly human. Heaven was coming down to man. The dark recesses of the mountains began to lighten. They stood forth as at the word of command from the Master of All; and as the changing mellow light moved downward that wonderful coliseum appeared clearly with its battlements and peaks and columns, until the whole majestic landscape was revealed. . . .

But there was no profanity in Muir's exclamation, "We have met with God!" . . . Again and again Muir would break out, after a long silence of blissful memory, with exclamations: "We saw it; we saw it! He sent us to his most glorious exhibition. Praise God, from whom all blessings flow!"

English University in Closer Touch With Social and Political Life

By WILLIAM A. ROBBIN, in Christian Science Monitor.

Now the American university system is not a mere machine for enabling boys and girls to earn their living any more than the English university is a place where youth imbibes a store of exquisitely useless knowledge concerning civilizations that have passed away. But in America it is nevertheless true that the college atmosphere is more utilitarian, in the sense that education is regarded as a method of learning how to do things rather than of learning a way of how to look at things. And hence in the world of action the American student is a far more accomplished person than his English cousin; he can drive an automobile and use a typewriter; in association with his fellows he runs a daily newspaper and raises enormous sums of money to build stadiums; he is specifically taught how to speak in public. He learns law and agriculture and-commerce and medicine and dentistry with a thoroughness that compels admiration and which makes one feel that the American university is in closer touch with the economic life of the nation than is the case in England.

But his cultural development and social outlook are not equal to those of the average English student. In England the university is a microcosm of the larger life of the nation, particularly in its literary, social, and political aspects. Every political party and every religious organization has a branch society in almost every university, not organized from above (like the Y. M. C. A. in America), but arising as a spontaneous growth among the students themselves. All the great questions of the day, political, social, religious, literary, and economic, are discussed eagerly and with a familiarity which is not to be found in the average American college; and the special representative of the universities in parliament gives a background of reality to these activities.

The English university is consequently in closer touch with the political and social life of the nation than is the case in the United States.

Characteristics of Good Citizenship for the Duty of National Defense

By GENERAL PERSHING, in U. S. A. Recruiting News.

The fundamental requirements of national integrity are sound and healthy minds and bodies, a determination to support our institutions and an intelligent participation in public affairs. These are the characteristics of good citizenship for all the duties of life as well as for the specific duty of national defense. The development of this type of manhood is a common objective, both for civilian agencies established to train men for their responsibilities in civilian life and for the army, which must train men for their technical duties of national defense.

During the war the army had an opportunity of studying intensively a cross-section of our young manhood and of securing valuable data concerning their physical condition, technical skill, attitude toward the country, intelligence, and co-operative spirit. These data contain information of fundamental importance to all who are interested in bringing up our youth. What has come to be known as the War department's educational program includes placing this information at the disposal of civilian agencies in order that they may make use of it in developing a virile type of manhood that can be relied upon to carry on in the eternal struggle for liberty and a larger life.

As a first step the War department called a conference last November for the purpose of indicating generally to a group of educators the nature of this material and its value to the nation as a whole. It was believed that these data would enable civil educational agencies to direct more intelligently both physical and mental training toward a higher conception of individual responsibility.

As one result, the National Amateur Athletic Federation of America is composed of some thirty national organizations that deal with physical training and development and it has undertaken the task of setting definite objective standards of physical fitness and of developing competition among local groups for the attainment of those standards. Another important consequence of that conference has been the creation by executive order of the Federal Council of Citizenship Training. This council is composed of the representatives of twelve of the more important offices in the federal government that deal with the education of citizens.
