BEHIND THE SCENES

BY MARY REBECCA DAYVAULT.

Gold and Black.

Amid the loud chatter and the giggles of a bunch of about thirty "made up" young people, there was one ghostly-faced young creature, dressed in a peasant costume, and, running for dear life.

"I'm not going to have any of that stuff put on my face," he exclaimed indignantly.

"Listen, Bill, you'll look funny with everybody but you made up," said Henri, the leading man, coming up in his gorgeous purple velvet suit trimmed in gold.

Billy, seeing there was no escape, walked over to the cold-cream jar, and taking about half of it in his hands began rubbing it on his face.

"Oh, that's too much," remarked a peasant girl, as she came to his rescue.

"Here, let me fix it!" After she had wiped off about half of the cold-cream, she produced the lip-stick.

"Now hold your lips naturally, Billy," she said, at which he opened his mouth as wide as he could.

"Oh, do close it, for heaven's sake!" she cried, laughing at the poor sufferer.

Next came the rouge, which she rubbed on liberally. When the eyebrow pencil was produced, he declared he didn't need any; but, knowing from past experience it is best to do what you are told, he allowed a lavish supply to be put on.

Finally the pale-faced peasant boy was transformed into a rosy-cheeked, happy-looking youth, though the process had cost him many frowns.

A long line of peasant boys was impatiently waiting to have their finishing touches applied. Mac Howard could be heard begging some maiden to put on his lip-stick, while a group of girls were exclaiming how pretty Pete Leutz's nose powdered. Robert Hahn was wildly searching for a comb to see whether or not his lip-stick was smeared. Fred McEachern wanted to know if his nose was shining. Each one, in fact, was anxious about the beauty of his appearance.

At last all were ready, lip-sticked and penciled, rouged and powdered to the limit. Bad little Serpolette and pretty Germaine, both dressed in costumes of silk with velvet bodices, adjusted their tall caps and declared themselves ready also. Jean Grenicheux, ruddy and jovial, and Gaspard, feeble, pale, and deeply-wrinkled, decided that they too were as beautiful as art could make them.

Everybody was hurried into place. Each peasant maiden gave a last tilt to her tall hat. The music started, up went the curtain, and the opera was on, but the bright footlights revealed to the audience nothing of the fun that had gone on behind the scenes.

Distinguish Between Productive Debts and Consumptive Debts.

Clarence Poe in Progressive Farmer.

There is hardly anything else The Progressive Farmer is so anxious to do as to awaken its readers to the danger and ruin involved in consumptive debt.

We say consumptive debt because there are really two kinds of debt and the two should never be confused. The two kinds of debt are (1) productive debt and (2) consumptive debt.

1. By productive debt is meant debt incurred to buy something which lives on—and not only lives but produces something to pay off the debt. If a one-horse farmer buys an extra horse, or if a tenant farmer buys land, or if a farmer buys improved seeds or implements or machinery or fertilized in such a way as to increase his earnings more than the amount of the purchase price, this is a productive debt and may be a mark of progress.

2. By a consumptive debt is meant a debt incurred to buy something which is consumed or destroyed without leaving anything behind to pay off the debt itself. A debt to buy food or feed or clothing or a luxury or extravagance is a consumptive debt.

As we have said before, there are two incorrect attitudes toward debt that have kept millions of southern farmers from prospering. The vast majority of our people have been too willing to incur consumptive debts. A considerable proportion of our people, on the other hand, have been so much afraid of any kind of debt that they have been unwilling to incur even those productive debts by which they might often have increased their own earning power and incomes.
