

Stewart's WASHINGTON LETTER

Solon LaGuardia Makes 'Em Sit Up When He Talks on Aviation.
By CHARLES F. STEWART
NEA Service Writer

Washington, March 1.—When Congressman Fiorello H. LaGuardia, of New York, has something to say in the House of Representatives about aviation, he's listened to.

He was a flier himself with the American forces in the World War. He won a major's rank, too, and a war cross and a knight commandship of the crown of Italy.

LaGuardia doesn't go as far as to agree with Ex-Colonel Mitchell that armies and navies are obsolete, but he does say the airplane has revolutionized war.

"What's more," he added, "our army and navy need know it, but they won't admit it, even to themselves."

Why not?

"Well," said the flying congressman, "in war time, what does a general do? Why, he commends a nice chateau, safely at the rear, and lives there in comfort, while others suffer all the hardships and take all the risks."

"It's fine, to stand on the bridge of a big battleship and maneuver a splendid fleet."

"A man who's used to the chateau or the battleship bridge can't afford to let himself realize that wars are fought now in the air."

But should the commander of an army or a fleet personally direct his forces from the air?

"If he wants to know what's going on," nodded LaGuardia. That's where he can see the whole thing.

"As I've said, the plane has revolutionized war."
