Livestock Farmer Must Have Business Sense

Raleigh, N. C., Sept. 27.—Emphasis today must be placed on the business side of farming and this is especially important in livestock farming. The producer who does not arrange his production and marketing according to markets and costs will fail.

"The successful livestock farmer always figures to get the greatest amount of profit from his finished stock," says W. W. Shay, swine extension specialist at State College. "The man who had 75 hogs averaging 175 pounds each on September first had a total of 13,125 pounds and the price was $15.00 per hundred making their value at the market amount to $1,968.75. If the freight rate from his station was 30 cents per hundred on a minimum car of 16,000 pounds or $48, this subtracted from the gross price would have left him, $1,920.75. If the cost of raising the hogs was $7.00 per hundred or $918.75, his net profit on the car would be $1,002.00 minus the yard charges and shrinkage."

But this farmer should not have sold for another two weeks in which time he could easily have added another 20 pounds to each of the hogs making them average 195 pounds each with a total weight of 14,625, when at the same price they would have been worth $2,193.75. Making the same deductions for freight and cost of production, he would have had a profit of $1,122.00. In other words, the profit on the car of hogs would have been increased by $120 for the two weeks of feeding which is $60 per week for his labor.

In the first case, states Mr Shay, there was a profit per pig of $13.36 and in the last case a profit per pig of $14.96. The price might have gone down but this is hardly likely during September according to an average of several years' prices. Weasured in terms familiar to North Carolina farmers, Mr. Shay estimates the loss of selling too soon to be the market value of over two bales of cotton.
