Pruning In Winter
Prevents Pear Blight

Raleigh, N. C., Dec. 6.—Cutting out and destroying in winter, the twigs and limbs of pear trees killed by blight during the growing season will control the destructive "fire blight" and eliminate the source of infection for the following year.

"Pear blight is produced by a bacterial germ," says G. W. Fant, extension plant disease specialist at State College. "This disease causes much concern to growers during the growing season, although it is during the winter months only that effective control measures can be put into practice. The disease is characterized by a death of the blossoms, young twigs and later, the larger limbs, giving twigs of affected trees the appearance of having been scorched by fire. No method of control by spraying has yet been found due to the manner in which the disease works beneath the surface of the bark."

Twigs affected with fire blight can be distinguished in winter by the adhering dead leaves and Mr. Fant states that it is a good practice to go over all affected trees during the dormant season and cut out, as far as possible, all blighted twigs. The cuts, he explains, must be made several inches below the lower limit of the canker in order to cut out all diseased wood. It is advisable also to disinfect the pruning implement after making each cut by dipping the implement into a solution of bichloride of mercury prepared in the proportion of one part of the material to 1,000 parts of water. This solution should be prepared in an earthen or wooden vessel. Pruning can be accomplished more easily if two sets of tools are used, keeping one set in the solution while the other is used for cutting. Pruning during the summer months has little value, states Mr. Fant.

Fire blight is not confined entirely to pears although it is most prevalent on this tree. Apple trees are sometimes severely injured, however.

Demonstrations conducted by county agents show the way to better farm practices and have influenced the adoption of many new practices on North Carolina farms.

Friday the 17
Our Market Will Close for the Christmas Holidays

The farmers of Person, Caswell, Granville, Orange and Durham Counties have been very liberal with us in selling their tobacco this season and we want to assure every farmer that it has been our pleasure to give every pile offered on our floor our very best personal attention, and if any one feels that we have slighted them in any way we hope they will tell us, so that we may convince them that it was not our intention, for we have no favorites—every one is treated alike on our floors

Our Market will open for business on Tuesday, January 4th, 1927, and we cordially invite every farmer in this section to bring us their tobacco, and we will see that they get the VERY HIGHEST PRICE at every sale.
