"A BACKWARD GLIMPSE FROM SHAKESPERE TO PLAUTUS."

This was the title of Prof. Harrington's paper read at the last meeting of the Shakespere Club. The paper first considered the limitations under which Plautus was compelled to work. Tragedy was not in favor in Rome. The crudeness of the theatrical arrangements, and of acting itself, prevented any such character representations as may be found in Shakespere. Worse than this, Plautus was compelled to borrow all his plots from the New Attic Comedy, which was tame, insipid, monotonous and immoral. All that he could do was to arrange and re-arrange the few stock characters of that form of the drama, and touch them with all the originality, liveliness and delicate strokes which his own genius and that of the Roman people would permit.

In this he was so successful that he remains till the present day the most representative and popular dramatist of Rome. By combining two plots in one sometimes, and by constantly aiming at liveliness and action, he satisfied the cravings of the Roman populace for a play of rapid movement and comparatively little mere dialogue. By a disregard for the unities of time and place he made his Greek characters perfectly at home in Rome. In his all-absorbing effort to please and amuse the people, he introduced all the tricks of the trade, such as alliteration, assonance, paronomasia, ludicrous word-coinage. For the same reason his plots are not for the most part of a high moral tone, and teach little of virtue. Yet there are important and striking exceptions, where emphasis is laid rather on character-study, honor, fidelity, pathos. His extravagant exaggerations are hardly equalled for their rollicking fun. His slaves and parasites are unique and inimitable, characters that are practically dead to Shakespere.

No other Roman dramatist can compare with Plautus in his masterly treatment of the constantly-shifting metres. By this means he indicates with great power and delicacy the play of the emotions in the speaker, sometimes changing the metre more than a score of times in half a hundred lines.

In word-building lay his greatest strength. In this he takes rank above all Roman writers. His picturesque formation set the style for all his successors, but none of them dared to follow as far as he had led.

He wrote for an uneducated public, and succeeded in both pleasing and partially educating them.
