Banquet Thursday night of commencement.

With the end of examinations and the general hub-bub over marks, there is brought to our mind one fact, that, to say the least of it, is peculiar. We see men who are known to be splendid students in all departments, who work hard in preparation and, though endowed with fine mental faculties, are forced to have a "3" or "4" in some departments, while they easily make "1" in other branches. Now he who works for marks, in our mind, misses the purpose for which he should be here; but marks are some evidence of scholarship, and it does seem strange that some professors think the best work that can be done for them is worth only eighty or ninety, while another professor thinks it is worth ninety-five or a hundred.

The departments here are all on an equal footing and no one would say that one is above the other, so it is not right that men and whole classes of recognized ability, should be virtually told by some professors that they may do well in other lines, but my work is above them.

Of course it matters not whether a man is given eighty or ninety-five after he has done the work; for in either case he knows just the same and is just the same; but it is not fair to force men who choose certain branches to even appear to the outside world to be poorer students than their classmates who take other lines of study.

Either these professors should value the work higher or the others put theirs on the same level. Let's have the marking uniform.

This is another thing we don't understand: why they call some examinations two hour examinations when the best students find trouble in finishing the work in from three and a half to four hours. "Two hours" seems to be a misnomer and might mislead the new students; so let's name them correctly by next time.

In the United States every two-hundredth man takes a collegiate course; in England, every five-hundredth man; in Scotland, every six-hundredth, and in Germany every two-hundred and thirteenth.

The oldest university in the world is said to be the University of Fez, the chief seat of Mohammedan theology in the Western world.
