The Library and Reading Room.

The TAR HEEL, last week had some suggestion on the use and care of books, referring, in that article, more especially to private librarians.

The same rules, of course, apply to books in a public library. Indeed if a person is going to be careless in the use of any books, it should not be in his treatment of those which others, as well as himself, are in the habit of using.

One of the most annoying things in connection with the reading of a "library book" is to find Tom, Dick, and Harry's pencil marks and comments scattered through the books. It is an extraordinary and peculiar development of conceit that can make a reader of a public book imagine that others care for his idea as to the best portions of the book. If a man chooses to mark his own books, let him do so, to his heart's content; but let him spare those that belong to the public.

An abuse which is carried to an unbearable extent at this University is the mutilation of papers in the reading room. The writer of this article, but a short time ago, saw a man deliberately cut out part of a page of one of the illustrated papers that had just been put on file.

Probably not one-twentieth of the men who habitually look at that paper had seen it. This was a new paper. After it had been on file for two or three days, its condition was disgusting.

One can be charitable enough to believe that a few men who do these things do them through sheer ignorance; occasionally, in some inexplicable way, a man drifts to the University who does not know what books and papers are for. Usually, however, but one explanation is possible, and that is that the men so offending are inexcusably thoughtless and selfish.

What to do with these men is a question. They will not read this article; they will not listen to you, if you attempt to read it to them; they are not to be reasoned with—they are irresponsible beings. A very drastic remedy is the only one that will have any effect. Treat them as you do other babies too young to know how to use a thing. Keep them where they cannot abuse it.

No Race with Yale.

Capt. Bullard of the Harvard crew was seen last evening in regard to the press dispatch from New Haven, which appeared in the morning papers, saying that an invitation from the Yale Navy for a Harvard-Yale crew race this year, was to be sent him shortly.

"I have received no such communication yet," said Captain Bullard, "and I will say now that there will positively be no race between Harvard and Yale this year whether I receive the invitation or not."

The New Haven dispatch stated that it was the intention of the Yale Navy to cut loose from the football department in their stand for no athletic relations with Harvard. President de Sibour of the Navy was designated to send a written challenge for a race, to Captain Bullard.

It is plainly Harvard's intention to stand by the resolution made in the spring, that a breach in football would mean a breach in all the branches of athletics.—Harvard News.
