cially. They have brought about Saturday half holidays and the eight hour work day. This has given laborers more leisure and so has brought about an opportunity for mingling with one another. This has brought more contentment and more efficiency.

The standard of morality has been raised by labor unions.

Total abstinence is the motto of practically all of the leading unions.

Intemperance is the greatest of evils in diminishing the efficiency of workingmen. Unions in making temperate laborers have made them more efficient. The spirit of mutual assistance and support has been brought about by unions. These unions in aiding workmen when in need have decreased their interruptions of work, and so have brought increased efficiency.

Unions have brought educational benefit, which has made skilled workmen of otherwise ignorant laborers. Unions have done away with child labor. Unions have been the chief cause that has brought about a public school system. Education has come from the union shop. The fact that labor unions have resulted in a more healthy condition for the development of our producing factors, is shown by the testimony of the leading employers of today. He quoted from the Industrial Commission; the president of the Builder's League, of New York city; the president of the Stafford Cotton Mills, of Fall River, Mass.; the president of the Midway Steel Company, of Philadelphia, and others.

Wright, for Carolina, in his rejoinder, summed up the argument of his opponents by saying that they had discussed the question from the labor unions point of view, barely touching the argument of the affirmative. He read from the Industrial Commission that the fundamental and paramount principles upon which labor unions claim to be founded showed that their rights alone were the sole aim of their organization. He stated that in America there were ten million laborers, and two million were members of labor unions, while there were eight million non-union men.

Mr. Golucke, in rejoinder said: The affirmative must show that labor unions have decreased output in the branches of industry in which union men have been employed. Everybody is subject to mistakes, and surely labor unions are not free. He showed the improved and prosperous condition of the country, giving for the reason the organization of labor. He dwelt upon the fact that union men were turning out more finished products than non-union men, hence the value of labor unions.

Mr. Johnston, in his reply, summed up his opponents argument by saying they argued the question from the standpoint of whether unions were beneficial to themselves. He declared that labor unions disregarded all rights of everybody else, and gave illustrations. He showed the decline in the ship building industry, caused by the labor unions, and that the most powerful company had moved its plant to Germany for existence. Growing enthusiastic, he stated that the negative had failed to deny a single statement of the affirmative, and "sirs, your silence in these answers has been eloquent." He said only twenty per cent. of American laborers are members of unions, while eighty per cent. are non union men.

Mr. Patterson in his rejoinder continued to show the advantage of labor unions in the output of finished products, class of labor, and insurance to capitalists. He said that labor unions worked hardships to non union men only. He said the unions favored arbitration and conciliation, and that they were growing in popular favor with the general public.

Each speaker was allowed twenty five minutes in which to make both speeches, and each consumed his full time.
