Just Gossip

Did you ever think what would happen if nothing happened? Well if nothing happened, we would not be happy—in fact we would not be to be happy, and there would be no happiness. But you might ask what would be. Well, in fact nothing would be—in other words there would be nothing. But if there was nothing what would be in the place of what there is?

But that hasn't got anything to do with happenings. Happenings are the most essential things in our lives. They are those things that give us the right to say something has taken place. But if nothing takes place has anything happened? Suppose everything should remain unchanged for just one day—Would anything have happened? Sure a great miracle would have happened. But if lots of things change, and much comes to pass, then much has happened. So we see it is absolutely impossible to keep some happening from happening. The nearest approach we could get to stop happenings, would be to stop everything—and then something great would have happened, which will probably not happen.

But as this could be continued to infinity, and no definite factors can be gotten, we cannot solve it, except by imagination. But according to Dr. Mims, imagination is the most vital part of our education, so before you do a thing always stop and try to think what will happen if you do it.

Pages from Dr. Battle's History

We have a letter from a quite bright, but not very orderly student, one of the best speakers in the institution, written September 23rd, 1840, which paints the attitude of the students to the Faculty in lurid colors. He stated that College was in a state of rebellion. The discipline was for sometime very slack. The result of the lenient system has been that "the strictness of morality has vanished, while at the same time College is much more moral." He explains this statement by saying that in small things, such as talking in recitation, drinking occasionally, and playing cards once in awhile, the students were more careless of detection, but in addition to riots, habitual intoxication and gambling, they were completely reformed. The Faculty, however, announced that the cords of discipline must be tightened. This fired the tempers of the students. The Ugly Club was at once organized. When the Faculty attempted to suppress it they were pelted with rocks and compelled to retire. Thereupon Professor Mitchell sallied forth with a sword cane and was again driven back.

Another regulation was adopted, wrote Mr. Mullins, and it was threatened to apply it to the Sophomore class. He does not state what it was, but from other sources it is learned that it was probably the prohibition against taking text-books, except the classics, into the recitation rooms. The whole class signed an agreement not to submit and sent it to the Faculty. They were required to withdraw it but refused, although "threats," persuasions and prayers were resorted to. After three conferences and notifications that dismissal would follow further stubbornness, the Faculty gave way and the class triumphed. President Swain then requested a meeting of the Trustees and the writer fears that this will cause a defeat of the students.

How much of this narrative is exaggerated it is hard to say. The writer was evidently a leader in the disorders and his animus is shown by his harsh epithets.

The records of the Faculty sustain the statements in regard to the misconduct of the "Fresh Treat," at which spirituous liquors were freely used. Nothing, however, was said of Dr. Mitchell's sword cane, which was probably a hickory stick.

Not a word is recorded of the defeat of the Faculty by the class. An anonymous letter of that period shows that the Professor of Mathematics (Phillips) was held to be responsible for the new regulation, sundry uncomplimentary epithets being hurled at him, his English birth being alleged as a cause of his severity to the students.
