

Women No Longer Flirt; Use Bodies Instead

By Fred Thompson

Women are no longer flirts. During my four years in Chapel Hill, only one coed has coquetted in my direction. Perhaps I am one of the "four out of five" who have . . . ; however most of my friends report the same sad state of affairs.

Why women are not flirting, we do not know. It may be that in their battle for "equal rights" (whatever that entails), women have sacrificed their most precious possession—the feminine personality. While we do not condone discrimination against women, we do hold that women should not forget that there are two sexes from a psychological as well as a physiological point of view.

We note with disgust the increasing popularity of this song and dance on the part of women: "All men want from women is to get their kicks." We do realize that sexual gratification is essential for the mental well being of both men and women. However, if all that men desired from women be sexual satisfaction in a mechanical manner, would it not be better for all concerned to institute legalized prostitution? Certainly such an institution would increase efficiency.

Although legalized prostitution might serve to lessen in some respects the sex-tensions prevalent in our society, it would not in any way aid in restoring to the mass of women the type of femininity which would become them. For such to happen, women must think of themselves as beings rather than bodies. And in their being, they should seek to regain the coquetry, the humor, the seeming naivete and the romance which made living laughable and lovable in the past.

First-hand analysis of the rapid changes will constitute a major job of the research staff. Under the major headings of housing and community planning, and personal adjustment of family members in the project-affected area, the study staff will seek to follow the relationship between needs for housing and community facilities and services, and the provision of these things. Another section of the study will deal with how the present residents and the newcomers adjust their habits and attitudes to the many changes.

Chancellor House indicated that the study is the first of its kind and should be useful to other areas where similar changes take place as major industries develop or move. The research team will utilize University personnel trained in town and city planning, housing community sociology, social and clinical psychology, and family sociology, he said.

"The substantial resources of the Institute for Research in Social Science, supplementing the training of the research staff, enable the University of North Carolina to undertake this activity," Chancellor House said. "This program will contribute general-interest knowledge of a practical and theoretical nature, and is an opportunity to add to our long-term objective of intensively studying the changing South and its place in the nation."

"At the same time, from the point of view of the sponsoring federal agencies, the study will provide a continuing story on the problems of the Savannah River area as they develop, thus not only serving as a guide to the administration of government programs in this area but also as a guide to meeting similar situations that may arise with rapid expansion of defense industries elsewhere in the nation."
