Government His Field, Population A Problem

Indonesian Visiting In United States To See How It's Done, Then Go Home & Do It; On Campus Now

Hassan Datu Manoppo, a man with a newly independent country but almost no local government, is on campus as part of a United States tour to get ideas for his home land of Indonesia.

He arrived at the University last week and will leave Saturday. He will head for home July 26 after nearly three months in this country as guest of the State Department.

Manoppo's visit in Chapel Hill is designed to give him opportunities to visit with officials of city and county government and to study the processes by which their functions are accomplished. His special emphasis is in the area of public finance.

Manoppo's governmental job in Indonesia is regent of the territory of Sangihe and Talaud Islands, a job corresponding to our governor. It takes 28 days to make the trip to the inhabited 98 islands in his territory, Manoppo said in an interview yesterday. And he has another 100 which are uninhabited.

When the Dutch gave the Indonesians their independence in 1949 they left a country with a 90 percent illiteracy rate. After only four years the Indonesians have trimmed this down to 60 percent.

Another problem which they are attacking, Manoppo said, is the over-population burden. The island of Java contains two-thirds of the 75 million population yet comprises only 18 percent of the land area. Efforts already are underway, he related, to spread the populace to the more sparsely settled islands.

Indonesia expects to make economic headway with her rich deposits of oil and tin, and exportation of tea, quinine (she produces 95% of the world's supply) and rubber. The Dutch feudal system which bonded her farmers is nearly broken up and nearly all of the farmers own the land they till.

Those interested in talking to the Indonesian official may make an appointment at the YMCA office by calling 6761.
