Carolina's Pride

Carolina's pride is her honor system.

For Carolina administrative and faculty members and her students, the honor system and student responsibility are synonymous. We as students are proud our University doesn't have hundreds of complex detailed rules covering every phase of student life and action, specifying when we can do what and how much of it. No, we students are to use our own judgment.

Our Honor System states: no student may cheat, lie, or steal, and must report anyone he sees doing so. A student must conduct himself or herself as a gentleman or lady at all times.

Only two sentences to govern and control student action. It sounds simple and easy, but these sentences really express and cover every situation. The first sentence is regarded as the Honor Code, for it embraces the very basic and fundamental qualities of an honorable person. The second sentence is referred to as the Campus Code, for it is concerned with the student's conduct at all times, on and off campus.

"No chain is stronger than its weakest link" is certainly applicable here, for each and every student is responsible to and for this honor system. To our regret some students can not accept this freedom in the proper spirit, and there are violations. These are reported to the Dean of Students' office which turns them over to the Honor Council Chairmen. Students, chosen by all-campus elections, comprise the Councils, conduct trials, and hand down sentences. There are women and men councils.

Of course, proceedings are never publicly published or mentioned—the councils do their duties of providing justice, fairness, and protection to all students. Those found guilty are not made public whipping boys, but receive sentences for correction and help. We also have an appellate court for students who feel they were wronged.

The base of all Carolina life and action lies in her Honor System. The sense of responsibility, for good wholesome living, and the formation of character under our System is unmeasurable, but we feel confident it adds tremendously to every student's education and better prepares him for living life itself.—Ed McCurry.

Economic Workshop Gets Under Way Here

Approximately 70 educators from all regions of the state are assembled at Chapel Hill for the second annual Workshop on Economic Education.

Sponsored by the University of North Carolina in connection with the National and North Carolina Councils on Economic Education, the workshop provides graduate credit in education.

All participants receive scholarships from the North Carolina Business Foundation covering board and tuition costs.

Purpose of the workshop is to provide a wider knowledge and better understanding of the American economic system.

This year's participants include school supervisors and principals, school librarians, and teachers on all educational levels.

Greetings were extended at the opening session by Dr. J. R. Skretting, Workshop Director; President Gordon Gray; Dean Guy B. Phillips, School of Education; and A. R. Doolley, Assistant Dean, School of Business Administration.

Speakers for the first sessions included Dr. B. U. Ratchford, professor of economics, Duke University, who talked on Southern economic problems; Dr. Milton Heath, head of the UNC Department of Economics; M. L. Frankel, associate director, the Joint Council on Economic Education, New York; Dr. James Gemmel, executive director, Commission on Economics in Teacher Education, and several members of the University's Education and Business Administration Schools.

Vesper Services

Vesper Services, sponsored by the Summer Activities Council and supported by the various student church organizations, will get underway Wednesday at 7 p.m., in the Arboretum. Plans for a varied and entertaining program of songs and speakers are scheduled.

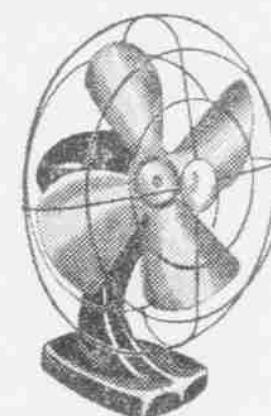

As these services are primarily a student undertaking, their success depends on student participation. All interested persons are urged to attend and promote this interdenominational feature.
