used only as the courts have directed. "We have set up irresponsible courts," he asserted. The cause for this mistake, he held, was the basic conception of individual liberty as freedom from restraint.

Soule deplored the use of prejudices and sentimentality by politicians of the nation and advocated the use of sound reason. He declared that individual liberty is non-existent unless the governed individuals have a part in choosing the restraints necessary for the growth of liberalism.

"No vulgarity," affirmed Soule, "is more common than the attack of all 'isms,'" as if the speaker himself were not defending Americanism.

"I believe in the legitimacy of revolution," stated Soule. He held that we must re-interpret our faith in those symbols which we select by self-organization so that we may effect change.

-isms, Yes and No

Warning that the proposed reforms smack of "socialism, collectivism and all such isms," Declairer Parker later condemned them because they would be "the death of individualism and humanitarianism."

Denying any intention to extol "rugged individualism against ragged collectivism," McMullan contended still that the latter has no place in the medical profession.

Blasting the opposition's arguments with onomatopoeic phrases and high allusions to traditional institutions, Orator McMullan prophesied that once socialized medicine gained foothold, "highpowered racketeering will take over the operating room."

Several of the original tunes for "Adventures of Oz" were composed by Robert Russell Bennett, New York composer who did the orchestration for "Show Boat," "Music in the Air" and "Anything Goes."

The century-old setting for "The Streets of New York," by Dion Boucicault, gives the "melter-drammer" a real flavor of yesterday with the villain, heroine and hero. Hissing the villain and cheering the hero whose valor brings everything out to a fine finish will be permitted.

In the final match of the evening, played after the anxious crowd had poured down from the bleachers, George Lott took a 6-4 set from Hans Nusslein.

published because they didn't sell. About this time the New Republic was just coming into being, and he became interested in the work. He has continued to work for the New Republic with only a few interruptions ever since. The essence of his ideas on how to get in the magazine world seemed to be to grow up with a new publication.

He recalled a debate in Philadelphia with "Ham" Fish in which the latter's pants kept falling down, when he was asked about Fish's statement as to the 6,000,000 starving Russians. He added that the debate with Fish had been on Soviet Russia, but that the reason Mr. Fish's pants wouldn't stay up was not Communist propaganda, but the lack of suspenders.

Congress Clears Way For Works Relief Bill

Washington, April 4.—(UP)—Warring factions in the House and Senate effected a compromise in their conferences today that cleared the way for the prompt enactment of the $4,880,000,000 public works relief bill that has languished in Congress for the better part of three months.

The conferees drafted an amendment, earmarking one dollar out of every three of the $900,000,000 to be loaned states and municipalities for the construction of non-federal projects for use in "direct work."

As the measure now stands, the administration would be authorized to lend money for the construction of new buildings, including power plants, but could not make advances for the acquisition of projects already constructed.
