Born in Cleveland, Ohio, Kay is now planning to live in Akron, Ohio, with her husband, Robert M. Ferrell, to whom she was married in Richmond, Va., before he went overseas as a captain in the Army. Kay says that she is now ready to settle down to keeping a home although it will probably seem somewhat like a vacuum at first after maintaining an office in the upstairs of the Y over the socializing of all Carolina students and the crazy groans of the juke box.

Kay Ferrell's quick smile and alert brown eyes will be missed around the Y and in many of the school's future activities for her two years here have been fortunate for Carolina.

Influx of Veterans Strains Colleges, Says Chancellor

Speaking at the opening session of the National Veterans Conference held recently Chancellor Deane W. Malott of the University of Kansas charged Congress with having provided "nearly free education for ten or twelve million people with no conception of the resultant strain on college facilities, and no adequate means of simple and effective aid."

Addressing educators and leaders in veterans affairs who had come together to discuss problems of education for veterans, Malott called for a meeting of the heads of the Veterans Administration, Federal Public Housing Authority, War Surplus Corporation, and representatives of education to devise "a plan of further authority and resources required" to meet housing and other needs—the plan to be placed before the President and Congress.

"Most educational institutions report record-breaking enrollments, the tide of applications still rises, and there is discussion that the educational facilities will break down, that the G.I. bill was fabricated by educators, and now they can't handle the job. Some Washington politicians are thus running for cover, at the gargantua which, in their generosity and gratitude to 10,000,000 or so soldiers, they created with little help or advice from the educational institutions," he charged.

"In the last analysis, housing would appear to the limiting factor," he revealed, "housing for students—both veterans and others, housing for faculty, and in some instances housing for educational and training facilities. There is no overall attack on the problem. A central core of understanding and interest is required.

"The whole organization of war surplus disposal has been chaotic," he further charged.

It has been attempting to organize, determine policy, and operate all at once with continual shifting of authority and directives, and a rapid turnover of often ineffective and inept personnel. Machinery for turning over surplus to the colleges and universities in effect one day is completely changed the next.
