NOTICE TO THE QUICK PEEK CLUB

All members will meet at the Intimate Bookshop, at 205 E. Franklin St., between 7:30 and 9 tonight for the purpose of snagging a free read of the sad tale of the slave who dug up Stanislaus Pilsudski. It's on page 49 of "To Hell With Hunting." Bring your crying towels.

This advertisement is paid for by those old friends of the Quick Peek Club, the Intimate Bookshop.

lina campus. Even the Men's Honor Council is involved in the furor over whether Henry made a particular statement.

"Henry" is Henry Bowers, president of the student body. He took an active part in denouncing the administration action in refusing to allow Negro students to sit in the student section of the stadium at football games.

On October 4th, students representing themselves and the student body in general appeared in Chancellor House's office to protest the administration action. Henry Bowers was absent from the student group although he had taken a definite stand in the matter.

On October 6th, Mac White mentioned Henry's absence in his Daily Tar Heel column. Mac stated that Henry, when questioned about his absence, said: "House has not come to me, why should I go to him."

Then the fireworks began. On October 10th, Henry released a statement to The Daily Tar Heel in which he claimed: "The statement . . . given as a direct quotation, is a misrepresentation of my true attitude in this question. I do not recall the statement and feel certain that if it were made it has been removed from its context."

On October 14th, Mac White reiterated that Bowers made the remark "House has not come to me, why should I go to him." And Mac mentions that there were two other people present when he and Henry were talking. The other two were Dick Murphy and Rolfe Neill.

On this same date, Rolfe Neil, in a letter to the student paper, accused Bowers of being "wittingly or unwittingly" a liar. This is a moot point, of course, as Bowers only said that he couldn't recall whether he made the statement. Rolfe went on to say that Henry did make the remark, exactly as quoted in Mac's column.

Yesterday it was learned that Mac White and Rolfe Neill had been summoned before the Men's Honor Council on a charge of lying! The person making the accusation was Henry Bowers.

Bowers, by his own admission, doesn't recall whether he made the remark and two of the other three people present claim he did make the remark.

Regardless of whether the remark was said jokingly or not, the point of issue is whether the remark was made.

If Henry doesn't recall whether the statement was made, the best count possible in the case is two to one that he made it, on the basis of testimony by those present.

If Henry suddenly recalls that he did or, as is more likely, that he did not make the statement, it will be extremely suspicious. Would he recall it now when he couldn't recall it ten days ago?

Rolfe Neill and Mac White cannot conceivably be judged guilty of lying, on the basis of such testimony.

On the other hand, Bowers is summoned before the Council, too. And the best count possible for him is two to one, with the two going the wrong way so far as he is concerned.

It's a big mess. But the lines are drawn. And the point of issue is clear-cut.

Did Henry say it?
