The convention delegates are, by and large, acutely sensitive to the inclinations of the electorate relative to the various candidates desiring the top nomination. Thus the popular will; thru interpretation, may be said to effect the selection of candicates to be voted on in November. To a great extent, these preferences are properly determined by the acceptability of the views of the respective candidates to the voters.

It is perhaps indicative of the general's innocence of knowledge of democratic philosophy and practice that he fails to see this very fundamental point. The only other conclusion to be drawn from his statement is that he is allowing himself to be made the tool of men who so distrust the popular will that they are afraid to subject their candidate to the pre-convention public scrutiny which has been the established practice in this country for over a century.

In either case, the result is identical: The General, drawing about himself his protective mantle of olive drab and brass, would allow himself to be campaigned for by others, and nominated in absentia by the Republican Convention-with a good chance at election-without ever having given the American people, even the Reidea of what he thinks of anything other than European defense:

As much as he might like to do so, Ike cannot enter politics without becoming a politician.

That the General has a right to run if he wishes, none will deny. But he owes it to those who want to see him President, served us long and well. Simply program. put, this means that if Ike has anything to offer the people, he should be willing to quit the Army, come home, and hit the trail along with the gentlemen from Ohio and Minnesota and California, so that he may be fairly judged by those whom he would serve.

Much of this press responsibility Scott places on the public's shoulders. Participation by the public should follow three lines, in his opinion. The best publications should be read, active participation in the form of letters to the editor should be practiced, and the right to become a competitor in the communications field namely television, should be exercised.

> The new code, according to its preamble, embodies prevailing conceptions of student justice and informs each student of the behavior considered detrimental to his welfare and to the welfare of the college community. Students who are found guilty by the student court may appeal their case to the dean of men who automatically may reduce all sentences but may not increase them. All cases are submitted to the court at the request of the dean of men.

Highest fine that can be imposed by the court is $25. Previously it was $50. Many of the penalties, however, are aimed at making the defendant more aware of his responsibilities as a student in a college community, it was pointed
