SAYS WINSLOW:

Fourth BA School Goal Is Education For Adults

PHILADELPHIA, Pa. — A UNC Business Administration professor said Thursday adult education, especially adult education for businessmen, is a two-way benefit and is the fourth great goal of a business school.

Professor Rex S. Winslow of the BA School Bureau of Business Services used the phrase "The Great Migraine" to describe the plight of business school deans wondering what to do about adding to the present goals—business education for undergraduates, for graduates and research.

Winslow said the fourth goal—education for business men in short courses, clinics, executive programs, workshops and the like—poses a new opportunity.

"Members of the University faculty who participate can find the experience rewarding," said Winslow. "In addition to financial remuneration, adult education affords a tremendous professional challenge. A real contribution by the faculty man to the experience of the businessman will be rewarded with immediate and sincere gratitude."

On the other hand, added Winslow, "there is little tolerance for sloppy and ineffectual work."

'NEW SPARKLE'
Both the faculty member and the businessman gains, he said. "It gives to the faculty member's teaching a new sparkle and vitality."

More than that, and most pleasing, is the attitude of the businessman. Besides returning year after year, his attitude and his concept of business "are apt to undergo a subtle and gradual but profound change," said Winslow.

"His interest may gradually shift from immediate dollar catching gimmicks to fundamental questions which have always challenged educated men. Businessmen have been known to shift their interest from how to collect overdue accounts to cultural anthropology," said Winslow.
