

Dr. Charles M. Weiss, professor in the Department of Sanitary Engineering, UNC School of Public Health, has developed a simple monitoring system for determining the presence of pesticide-contamination in fresh-water sources.

His Study May Insure Fresh Water

A method of protecting fish and aquatic wild life from insecticide-contaminated water and of insuring the safety of drinking water supplies endangered by overzealous application of potent pesticides is the product of research by a UNC scientist.

Dr. Charles M. Weiss, professor in the Department of Sanitary Engineering in the UNC School of Public Health, has developed a relatively simple monitoring system to determine levels of fresh water contamination due to certain insecticides. This is accomplished by examining with a simple test the activity of "enzymes" in the brains of fish that have been exposed to the insecticides.

recreational and drinking water sources, particularly where certain classes of insecticides have been used to control gnats, mosquitoes, blackflies, agricultural pests and other insects.

Because of recent excitement about Rachel Carson's new book, "Silent Spring," Dr. Weiss's findings inadvertently will be entered in an enlarging national debate.

"The extremely widespread and often indiscriminate use of chemical agents for control of insect pests is rapidly becoming one of the classic examples of man's willful degradation of his environment," said Dr. Weiss in the introduction to his recent paper describing the procedures that could be used in a monitoring system.

duction to his recent paper describing the procedures that could be used in a monitoring system. "The potency of the newer compounds developed for insect control create lethal conditions not only for the organisms against which they are primarily directed but also for other organisms which may be exposed by direct application or by runoff into receiving bodies of water. . . . The practice of insect control by direct introduction of insecticides into the aquatic environment for destruction of aquatic larval stages (such as mosquito larvae) poses a significant problem."

As mosquito larvae) poses a significant problem.

A check for more than $4,000 for the support of graduate students in city planning and urban renewal during the 1962-63 school year was presented to the University Monday.

At a special ceremony held in the office of the Department of City and Regional Planning, John A. Parker, Department Chairman, accepted the check from Mr. F. E. Patton of Durham, representing the Sears-Roebuck Foundation, donor of the grant.

J. Lee Sammons of Washington, D. C. and Francis H. Parker of Asheville, graduates of Duke University and Wesleyan University, respectively, were made recipients of the award. Professor Parker said. Francis Parker also held the grant during the 1961-62 school year.

The check includes both a stipend for the students and an unrestricted cost-of-education grant to the school.
