A few years ago someone attempted to label Carolina's defensive football unit—"the Headhunters."

The 1966 edition of the Tar Heel defensive unit has probably been called a few things too. The frustrated Michigan quarterback last Saturday probably called them the most aggressive, tenacious gang of tacklers he'd ever seen.

The poor Wolverine ends trying to catch passes all afternoon probably called them a bunch of long-armed thieves. The battered group of Michigan offensive linemen most likely called them immovable.

Who are the members of this defensive team that held nationally ranked Michigan to three yards rushing in the second half and held the vaunted Michigan passing attack to only 11 completions?

The defensive tackles are manned by senior tri-captain Hank Sadler and sophomore Tom Renedo. These two plus middle guard Jimmy Masino made life rough for the poor Michigan running backs coming up the middle.

At defensive end Michigan found Bo Wood and Lyn Duncan. These two Tar Heels helped keep Michigan from running wide and put constant pressure on the Wolverine quarterback. When Duncan was moved to offensive tackle in the second half, sophomore Neil Rogers replaced him in a more than adequate fashion.

Linebackers Bill Spain, Brent Milgrom, and Mike Horvat performed admirably.

The defensive secondary was a story in itself. Gene Link was all over the field, making key interceptions in several places. Billy Darnall and Jack Davenport also played important roles in the victory. Sophomore Gayle Bomar, who has developed into an outstanding defensive safetyman, was instrumental in stopping the Michigan attack.

These players plus others who performed in a part time role deserve a great deal of credit. Team efforts win ball games and the defensive team for UNC is certainly carrying its share of the load.
