White Asks Library

Tentative plans to establish a South Campus library in Chase Hall were announced yesterday by Ben White, president of the class of 1969 and former SP legislator. "My plans are not to compete with facilities provided by the Wilson Library, but rather to provide a convenient study room on South Campus stocked with reference books, modern civilization texts, and perhaps novels used in freshman and sophomore courses."

Religious Youth Programs Meaningful, Say Students

By CINDY BORDON DTH Staff Writer Fifth in a series

The end is in sight. This is the last in the "God at College" series—but it's just the beginning for the new religious concepts that have taken root at UNC.

The previous stories in this series have reviewed (1) the older, more inefficient methods of religious instruction, (2) the objectives of today's religious leaders in regard to the college student, and (3) what specifically is being offered to the UNC student by the religious organizations on campus.

This final story is concerned with the success of what has taken place. Just how effective are the new methods and objectives of the campus churches?

Students Say

The best authorities to answer this question are, of course, the students who have been active in the programs offered by the organizations. Here is what some of them had to say:

Ron Byers, a sophomore, was enthusiastic about his experience with the Baptist church. "I really thought about religion for the first time when I came to college," said Byers. "Coming from a small town, I was used to being told what to believe—religion was almost forced on through participation in the activities of the church.

Susan Lewis, a Presbyterian who is studying nursing, especially enjoyed the Westminster seminars because they "do not provide pat answers, but rather challenge and en-me. But here it's different. Here the church is more liberal, and it gives the student a chance to ask why he believes what he does."

A third-year law student earnestly commented that some of the most significant and stimulating discussions he has found at the University have been at the Presbyterian Student Center.

Deep Concern

A senior sociology major, Joe Kaylor, said that his experience with the activities of the Methodist Wesley Foundation have confirmed his belief in humanity. "I am deeply concerned with communication between people," he said. "This is why I am joining the Peace Corps for work in South America when I graduate. I have found that seminars, movies, and particularly the lectures of Banks Godfrey that I attended here at the Wesley Foundation have demonstrated a concern for like ideas, and for this reason my faith in humanity has been confirmed."

Susan Porter, a senior nursing student, said that the Baptist church activities have been a source of fellowship and of study in current issues through a religious perspective.

"It has been a consoling factor, and a place to turn to. I have particularly enjoyed helping others feel a part of Christianity through fellowship. The church has been a most important factor in my life here at UNC, and it will continue to be so."

A Catholic girl said that one of the strongest factors of her college education has been the experience of finding her own way to Christian faith
