

Grail Mural Field Narrowed To 20

By ASHLEY THRIFT
DTH Sports Writer

Grail-Mural Basketball is still the big news in intramural play. The field for the huge tournament has been trimmed down to just 20 teams and the competition is now assured of being really stiff.

Thursday's games offered some surprises. The Independent Nads, last year's champ, were eliminated by a fine Aycock Asvogel team by the close score of 26 to 24. Jack Hooks led the winners with his double figure scoring of 10 points. Mac McGee had a game high of 12 points in the losing effort.

The Sig Ep Black team won by a single point over the DU Turkeys. In the close game, 23 to 22, neither team was able to get a lead and the outcome was not settled until the final minutes. Fred Hutchinson was the point leader for the winners with 8. The DU squad featured balanced scoring in the low scoring contest with Scott Wallace leading the team with 8.

Phi Delta Theta Blue turned on the point machine and crushed the Aycock Aardwolves 47 to 21. Frank Kelly had 16 first half points and finished with 19 to pace the winners. Harold Pollard continually set the plays up and controlled the tempo of the contest. Bill Adams got 9 points in a losing effort.

In one of the runaways of the night, Ehringhaus A Blue blasted the Pi Kap Phi White team 33 to 7. John Wilson led the winning effort with his all around and game high 9 points. John Rudisill and Jesse Sigmon contributed 8 and 7 points respectively.

"We must come clean with what's going on in the Judiciary and face up to the assumptions behind our positions. The Student Body desires to have more than empty phrases and emotional rhetoric. It is entitled to an understanding of the impact and consequences of each proposed course of action.

"To fulfill this obligation, we must get on with the hard work of developing a whole new concept of the Judiciary.

"All those interested are urged to attend the meeting this Tuesday."

Morgan Presents Views

By BOBBY NOWELL
DTH Staff Writer

State Attorney General-elect Robert Morgan said Thursday night he agrees with UNC Chancellor J. Carlyle Sitterson that laws concerning drug usage, particularly marijuana, carry too severe penalties.

Speaking before a small audience in Carroll Hall, Morgan declared, "I agree with the Chancellor that penalties for the users of certain drugs are too severe. For example, a user convicted of a second drug offense automatically goes to prison for five years.

"However, I definitely think using narcotics illegally ought to be punishable by law, and I don't think that the present laws are too stringent for suppliers of the unlawful drugs," he added.

Morgan said that unlawful drug consumption in North Carolina "is much more prevalent than most people think." He noted that, among his plans for the Attorney General's office, he is to provide for a full-time narcotics squad, which the state currently does not have.

"Right now the State Department of Investigation (SDI) is too overworked to have a group concentrate on the narcotics problem," he said. "But in order to combat the rising amount of usage, I hope we will be able to develop a squad which can detect the suppliers as its main task."

in a brisk question-answer period following his address to the campus Young Democratic Club.

He remarked that he does not believe the present penalties for resisting the draft to be too severe. "I don't think that it is fair for one man's son to be drafted and serve two years in Vietnam, when another boy can refuse induction and serve a lesser time in jail," he said.

Morgan, who was once one of the main supporters of the now-defunct Speaker Ban Law, also disclosed that he is not in favor of re-enacting the law in more specific terminology. "I think the old law served its purpose to college administrators," he said.

He pointed out that while the N.C. Attorney General stands ready to respond to local authorities in requesting help for handling student unrest, "it has no specific duties" in counteracting riots unless summoned.

"However, I believe it will be my responsibility to visit college campuses around the state and to know what young people think," he added.

Enumerating his plans as Attorney General, Morgan said he has devised a program to "bring the fundamental principles of criminal law into the public high schools," as a method of counteracting high teenage crime.

Also he called for more attention to training of law-enforcement officers, for more jail reform and for more involvement by qualified young people in government.

A conservative, Morgan commented that the Supreme Court "has made law enforcement more difficult, but not impossible.

"I think we have neglected the area of prevention of crime. Our greater concentration or apprehension of law-breakers has made enforcement more difficult."

UAWMF March

Mann says that of the three servicemen who originally contacted the UAWMF, two have been court-martialed, and the other is under investigation by the C.I.D. (Criminal Investigation Division) in preparation for a possible court-martial.

According to Mann, "the reason given for these court-martials is that they as soldiers exercised their right to freedom of speech by criticizing the war in Vietnam."

Mann is among the students who were arrested at Ft. Bragg. Their case is being reviewed with the aid of the American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU).

Mann says that the purpose of Saturday's march is to demonstrate the "wide support" UAWMF has gained on the issue of freedom of speech for GI's.

resistance up by Chapel Hill merchants who fear that sending the students home early would seriously curtail the storeowners' profits from student Christmas shopping.

The Technician said that "it is not befitting a major university to be hamstrung in its efforts at self-betterment by the avaricious efforts of small, external pressure groups" and suggested that Chapel Hill merchants "should resign themselves to running a 'Shop Early' advertising campaign."

Mark-Up Viewed

The Daily Tar Heel learned Friday that the 40 per cent price mark-up estimated by Dr. C.S. Longsdon was incorrect in the context in which it was used.

According to Tom Rogers, an interested student, Longsdon's percentages were computed as the ratio of list price minus wholesale cost over list price. The DTH computations were made over wholesale cost.

If Dr. Longsdon had computed his percentages by the DTH method, he would have come up with a merchant's retail markup of the committee called for greater flexibility in the curriculum so that individual students could assert those factors which make him an individual in his academic affairs.

Day asked the question, "What is the rationale behind the requirements for the General College such as language requisites?"

He proposed structuring the courses in such a way that students would gain insight into the three major divisions of the Curriculum at UNC—social sciences, natural sciences and humanities, but he left with enough options to pursue his own interests.

Questions from others present at the hearing centered on the relevancy of some areas of required courses to the major field of study for students.

Talks centered on such subjects as the foreign language requirements and the English requirements for the General college. While it was generally felt that there should be courses required for these areas, the courses should be of a different form than now exists.

The Merzbacher Committee will continue its hearings and on occasions will hear experts in several fields of education such as a representative from the State Board of Education.

about 66 per cent or slightly higher. This can be compared with the 95 per cent figure from the Book-Ex.

Dr. Logsdon's figure of 40 per cent average retail markup may be compared with his computation of about 48 per cent markup at the Book-Ex.

Bob Manekin, of the Student Stores Committee met with Tom Shetley, head of Student Stores, Friday to discuss the figures.

days, because the younger coach has been mighty uppity lately. Three straight times Smith's Tar Heels have defeated the Baron's best, and two years ago UNC won at Lexington, where Kentucky once won 129 straight games.

That kind of foolishness is enough to start one of Kentucky's famous family quarrels which sometime result in running gun battles, except this time it would be between two nasal-tongued flatlanders from the plains instead of the nasal-voiced mountain breed.

Kentuckians have been out for Carolina's hide ever since the Tar Heels' 84-77 win in Greensboro last year. From Ashland to Paducah they have been sharpening their knives and stuffing muskets, readying to give Carolina a Daniel Boone-style welcome.

The opposing players need no more incentive than the fact that UNC is second-ranked nationally, Kentucky third.

But to Kentucky natives it means more than that. The prestige and honor of the whole state is on the line, because Kentuckians claim their basketball is the best in the country, better than Indiana and certainly better than what those city slickers have in New York and Washington. Another loss to Carolina would sorely hurt their pride, and when hillbillies are personally affronted, they shoot before they talk.

And Rupp, who many claim is too old and surely can't outrun buckshot, may go out with the two-handed set shot.
