Shortage may be alleviated

Students who were closed out of their dormitory rooms for fall semester may still get on-campus housing next year, Connie Nelson, assistant director of University Housing said Monday.

More than 300 students were closed out of rooms and are still requesting housing for next year.

Approximately 300 students got rooms last year because over 600 cancellations were handed in during the summer from students who moved or dropped out of school, Nelson said.

The spaces, not always in the dorm of the applicant's first choice, were allocated on the basis of when the students applied and what spaces became available during the summer, she said.

Although Nelson expects the housing department to find rooms for all closed-out students by fall, "we still encourage them to seek off-campus housing now, instead of waiting until August and having to pay for a more expensive apartment in case we can't get them a room."

"Students have been pretty understanding; they know we don't have the space right now," she said. "A lot of parents who haven't had the same communications from us are upset."

Nelson said the department's official policy is to promise housing to closed-out students only when it becomes available.

Rape clinic

"How to Avoid Rape" will be discussed by Judith Kraines and Francis Johnson of the Chapel Hill-Carrboro Rape Crisis Center today, at 8 p.m., in 206 Union.

The discussion, sponsored by the Association of Women Students (AWS), will emphasize precautionary measures women can take to avoid rape. Simple escape and self-defense methods which need no advance preparation will also be demonstrated.

Charter amendment approved

by Janet Fry Staff Writer

An amendment to the Chapel Hill charter limiting the town's power to operate human services programs was approved, 4-3, by the Board of Aldermen Monday night. Mayor Howard Lee cast the deciding vote.

The amendment, added to satisfy objections by the county, stated that the Chapel Hill Department of Human Services will not compete with, duplicate or supersede programs of the Orange County Department of Social Services.

The board also voted against rescinding its previous approval of the charter and voted against recalling it from the N.C. House Local Government Committee II.

Aldermen Alice Welsh, who moved to rescind the charter approval, and Thomas Gardner objected to the sections of the charter concerning absentee voting, day care support and the Department of Human Services.

They said the additions to the charter should have been reviewed by the Charter Commission. Welsh said the General Statutes gave authority for social services to the county, thus the town should remove this from its charter.

In support of the charter, Lee advised the board to be farsighted enough to approve the charter and amendment so the town can take advantage of any funds available for the programs in the future. If not, he said, "We'll be sitting on the sidelines while the ballgame is being played."

Lee said the additions were not intended to show ingratitude to the Charter Commission.

After voting to approve the charter amendment and send it to the General Assembly, Lee said, "This speaks for Chapel Hill's inconsistency."
