

Board of Governors decides tenure action

by Sherrill Braswell
Staff Writer

Procedures for laying off tenured faculty members because of financial emergencies or program changes were adopted Friday by the UNC Board of Governors.

The board's action laid out only the minimum standards for the 16 campuses in the UNC system, said Maceo A. Sloan, chairperson of the Committee on Personnel and Tenure which proposed the revision of the University Code.

Tenured professors already could have been laid off in emergencies, but no consistent policy as to how it would be done has existed. Robert E. Phay, a special assistant on the UNC staff, said.

Under the new regulations, if a chancellor were forced to lay off faculty members, he would have to consult his school's academic officers and then obtain approval from the president of the Consolidated University and the governing board.

Once laid off, faculty members involved would be allowed due process procedures under the University Code.

If a faculty member with more than two years of service were laid off because his program was being curtailed, the University would have to give a full year's notice. A 90-day notice would be required for beginning faculty members and a 180-day notice for faculty members in their second year of service.

In other action, the board approved the appointment of retiring N.C. State University Chancellor John T. Caldwell as special assistant to UNC President William Friday. The $26,000-a-year position will be a full time job working on "special projects," including work on UNC's long-range plans.

The board granted licenses to Hardinger Business College of Raleigh and Biscayne Business College with campuses in Charlotte, Gastonia and Concord.

These licenses were granted with the understanding that the schools would not use this information in attempts to solicit students. This license would enable the schools to conduct degree-granting programs.

The board also presented certificates of commendation to four retiring members of the Board of Governors for their long periods of dedicated service to the Consolidated University.
