New policies adopted by RHA

Consolidation no longer enforced by Housing

by Bob King
Staff Writer

Consolidation, the policy requiring campus residents to accept a new roommate if their previous one withdraws from the University, is no longer being enforced, Director of University Housing James Condie said Monday.

The consolidation policy is no longer necessary because the housing department has adopted a full-year housing contract and a $50 penalty for students who withdraw and break their contract, he said. These measures ensure that the housing department loses less money due to broken contracts. "Two years ago, a student who broke his room contract paid no penalty and got his rent money back on a pro-rated basis," Condie explained.

Although the official policy requiring consolidation will stay on the record, the housing department will no longer force students to move or accept new roommates unless it is required to do so by another University department, Condie said.

Students may break their housing contracts for reasons of health, financial hardship or illness, but they must forfeit $50 and pay rent for the time they spent in their dorm. Last year, students who withdrew from the University for any of these reasons were refunded all their rent money and were required to pay a penalty of only $25.

A student who tries to cancel his contract without withdrawing from the University is not considered to have a valid excuse and must forfeit the entire rent cost, Condie said.

Condie explained that the housing department plans its fall budget at 99 per cent occupancy in the residence halls and its spring budget for 95 per cent occupancy. If these levels are maintained, rent will not be increased.

Area map for bicyclists ready

A free map measuring the time it takes bicyclists to reach various destinations in the Chapel Hill-Carrboro area is now available from the UNC Department of Geography.

The map is divided into concentric circles which designate all locations lying at three-minute intervals from the intersection of Columbia and Franklin streets, said professor Richard J. Kopec, who teaches the applied cartography class in which the map was produced.

Data for the map was collected by bicyclists who rode in varying directions from the intersection, Kopec explained. "Every three minutes they noted on a conventional map where they were," he said.

After six one-hour trips had been made on each road, the data was assimilated. The map was made by drawing concentric circles around the intersection and adjusting the actual road distances to three-minute distances.

Therefore, long distances which were traveled in a short time appear on the map as short distances, and short distances which were traveled in a long time appear as long distances, Kopec said.

Learn how to make a Tequila Sunrise.
(This way the semester won't be a total loss.)

Mix 4 oz. of orange juice with 1 1/2 oz. Tequila in a glass with ice. Pour in 1/4 oz. of Giroux Grenadine. See the Sunrise. Stir the Sunrise. Now enjoy the Sunrise. But remember the Giroux Grenadine otherwise it won't be a Sunrise. There. Aren't you glad you learned something this term?
