Chapel Hill drought may be imported

by Patti Tush Staff Writer

Climatologists do not know the cause of Chapel Hill's drought, but Peter Robinson, assistant professor of geography, said he thinks it is related to the severe drought conditions in Western Europe.

The entire global weather picture affects weather in specific areas, he said.

"You can't look at the weather here without also looking at California, Japan and Western Europe.

"What happened there a week or a month ago affects what happens here," Robinson said.

A large mass of air has settled over Western Europe, thus blocking the raincarrying westerly winds, Robinson said. The path of the winds has shifted to the north. This shift has eliminated much of the rainfall for Western Europe and the southern United

But even Robinson admits that his is only a partial explanation. As Robinson's colleague, geography Prof. Richard J. Kopec, puts it, "Climatologists don't know very much for certain, at all."

"There is no normal weather," Kopec said.
"Data has been collected, at best, for 200 years and only on populated land areas. That is too short a time span to determine the workings of the atmosphere.

"We know that climate changes. We know that Greenland was once green and ice once covered the earth." But Kopec added, "We are unable to predict future weather or say what normal is."

"The early '60s, for most of the United States east of the Rocky Mountains, were good years for farming," Robinson said. The seasons seemed normal and the rainfall regular, according to Robinson.

"Since then, the weather has been more variable. There have been droughts nationwide and most farmers have had problems with their water supply."

Robinson speculated that this variable weather will continue for a few years.

However, Kopec pointed out atmospheric models and hypotheses demand a long waiting period to prove themselves correct.

Although the actual weather conditions may seem to support a particular theory concerning the climate, Kopec said the reasons are rarely definite.

Kopec said that since 1940, after a halfcentury of warming, the earth's temperature has decreased by 15 degrees Celsius. Yet, Kopec said, climatologists are not sure what has caused the sudden cooling.

But Kopec said he believes that the earth's temperature is increasing because of man's output of carbon dioxide.

"As long as man continues his consumption of fossil fuel and burning of agricultural lands, he will continue to put more carbon dioxide into the air," Kopec said.

"The carbon dioxide serves as a blanket to keep heat from leaving. Eventually the ice forms will begin to melt.

"I did a very tongue-in-cheek article which dealt with the possible consequences."

The article said as early as 2050 a.d., the level of the oceans may be raised 100 meters (330 feet).

"Chapel Hill would be a seaside resort," Kopec said.
