Colby

support either their government or the American assistance.

"The central contradiction (in U.S. policy)," Porter said, "is that the United States supported governments which we knew were unpopular and we maintained them only by military force."

Porter said the South Vietnamese hated Diem as much or more than the communists because Diem supported the colonial social system and used massive police reprisals, with CIA help, to stifle dissent.

But Richard Hunt, an Army historian currently writing a history of the pacification program, said U.S. policy failed in Vietnam for a different reason.

Pacification was brought to a standstill in 1968, Hunt said, by the Tet Offensive, a thrust by communist forces into South Vietnam's major cities that began on Jan. 31, 1968. The communists pushed deep into the cities, at one time reaching the grounds of the U.S. embassy in Saigon, before being repulsed.

"The American press by February and March '68," Hunt said, "shocked by the offensive, assumed pacification had been dealt a serious blow."

Hunt said the psychological effect of Americans viewing the Tet Offensive led to the eventual U.S. withdrawal from the war.

South Vietnam was overrun by North Vietnam in 1975, ending a conflict that had lasted for over two decades.

Colby said the South Vietnamese had planned a thrust against the communists in 1976 and anticipated a communist offensive in 1975. The psychological effect of the U.S. Congress' refusal of military aid to South Vietnam, Colby said, was the "root cause" of South Vietnam's downfall.
