The hum of these transformers may soon die down to a mere mutter as UNC coal supplies dwindle and authorities worry. Present supplies of this increasingly scarce fuel should last a month. Pictured here is a power station on Cameron Avenue.

UNC coal supply slipping, may be gone in one month

By PAM KELLEY Staff Writer

Even though UNC's coal supply is not yet critically short, administrators are wondering how they will heat buildings on campus a month from now. Utilities Director Robert Peake said.

Gov. Jim Hunt last week urged North Carolinians to conserve energy voluntarily by cutting back thermostats to 65 degrees during the day and 60 at night.

But UNC has no plans to comply fully with the governor's mandate, said John Link, heating and air conditioning superintendent.

UNC's coal stockpile is not as large as Link and Peake had hoped because the 84-day coal strike and winter weather have slowed coal shipments.

Link said Friday some thermostats on campus have already been adjusted so buildings are not heated from 10 p.m. to 4 a.m. weekdays or over weekend periods.

University administrators have no plans to reduce heating levels as the governor requested because the large number of thermostats would pose time and manpower problems, Link said. Warm weather and spring break next week may cut campus energy consumption 33 percent and help avoid a crisis, the superintendent said.

Hunt press aide Stephanie Bass said the governor's energy plan may have prevented energy shortage problems such as North Carolina had last winter.

"We are about two weeks away from the mandatory conservation phase of the plan, which would include a four-day workweek for state government workers and a 60-hour workweek for retail businesses," Bass said.

The governor ordered mandatory wintertime fuel cutbacks in early February 1977 because of the severity of the winter coal shortages.

Mandatory conservation measures for UNC could lead to restrictions on extracurricular activities because of curtailments of nighttime lighting and heating, Bass said.

Link said if mandatory conservation is implemented, power plant operators will reduce the temperature in hot water pipes heating campus buildings.

Employees question fairness of paycheck deduction policy

By MICHELE MECKE Assistant Managing Editor

Charles Teague, a supervisor at the UNC physical plant was upset when his last paycheck was short $20. Like 57 other University employees during the last pay period, money was deducted from Teague's pay as restitution for unpaid parking fines.

Charles Daye, an associate professor in the UNC School of Law, says he considers such deductions "the taking of property without due process."

The University bases its authority to deduct money from paychecks on a general provision adopted by the Board of Trustees. The Board takes its authority from a N.C. General Statute under the Higher Education Act, which provides that "each board of trustees may establish procedures for the collection of these (parking) penalties, and they may be enforced by civil action in the nature of a debt."

But Daye says, "I don't see that the board has been delegated such authority." Daye says he believes the statute allows the University to bring a civil suit against persons with unpaid fines, but that it does not provide for payroll deduction.

Daye and Barry Nakell, another associate professor in the law school, both had money withheld from their pay for parking violations in 1976. "I found it extremely offensive," Nakell said. "I think the parking situation here is arbitrary, especially around the law school."

Daye said he has registered numerous complaints regarding University parking policies but had received no satisfactory response from Ted Marvin, director of the UNC Security Services Department, which oversees campus parking.

Daye said he questions "whether the University, is authorized to reduce employees' pay" and "whether parking appeals procedures satisfy fairness" by providing due process. But Marvin said that before initiating the payroll deduction policy, the University checked with attorneys from the Institute of Government and the state attorney general's office.

"In the opinion of the University it (payroll deduction) is legal, and we will continue to do it," Marvin said.

In an opinion requested by the University in 1974, Joseph Ferrell, an Institute of Government professor, said that in the case of UNC, withholding parking fines from paychecks does not constitute garnishment of wages. Ferrell defined garnishment as a proceeding in which a creditor seeks satisfaction for a debt from property or credits owed the debtor from a third party.

In the case of UNC and its employees, Ferrell said, there is no third party involved. "In such a situation, it is my opinion that withholding the penalty from the wages constitutes a set-off and not a garnishment."

Teague, Daye and Nakell complained of being unaware of the University's authority to deduct money from their paychecks, saying they never had given consent for such a deduction. "I didn't realize it if I signed such a consent," Nakell said. "If I had I wouldn't have done it."

Marvin said that written consent is not necessary for deductions of this nature. The University's authority to withhold pay for outstanding parking fines is a matter of public record, he said, and is stated in several publications dealing with parking.

Marvin also said that persons who do not pay their fines within 72 hours of the time the citation is issued are notified of the payroll deduction procedure in a follow-up letter.
