

Artists leave Soviet ballet

NEW YORK (AP)—A mother and son, the latest defectors from the Soviet Union's Bolshoi Ballet, arrived here by plane Wednesday from Tokyo, tired but "very happy" to have asylum in the United States.

Soulamif Mikhailovna Messerer, 71 a top Soviet ballet instructor, and her dancer son, Mikhail Messerer, 31, who were lesser members of the troupe, but came from one of the Soviet Union's most famous ballet families, defected Tuesday in Tokyo.

During a tour of the United States last August and September, three of the Bolshoi's best known members defected.

The two were escorted to a podium by a half-dozen Port Authority policemen after clearing customs and Mrs. Messerer gave a brief message in English. Then her son, who speaks no English, read a statement in Russian.

Mrs. Messerer said she wished to "thank the American government for the opportunity to be here and thank the Japanese government for their help."

She added that "the Soviet embassy (in Tokyo) didn't do anything against us."

It was reported in Tokyo that the Messerers talked with Soviet Embassy officials and told them they were defecting to seek greater artistic freedom.

Changing roles

Seminar and slide show about University women

Women. Their role in the University has expanded immensely since 1897, when women were first allowed to enroll at UNC.

Last Wednesday night, "Women and the University," was the topic of discussion at a slide presentation and seminar sponsored Wednesday by the Association for Women Students, the Panhellenic Council and the Women's Studies program.

The presentation focused on how the treatment of campus women as students, faculty and subject matter has changed throughout history. Mary Turner Lane, director of the Women's Studies program and Joan Scott, professor of history, spoke on the topics of "Women as Students" and "Women as Faculty."

Women were not allowed to enroll at Carolina until 1897, when President E. A. Alderman said the time had come to deal with the education of womenhood, Lane said. Alderman's proposal opened up post-graduate studies for women.

Before the first women's dorm, Spencer, was built in 1925, female students had to live in boarding houses across town, Lane said. It was a great struggle to get the dorm built because there was a lot of antagonism from the male students and some members of the administration.

Women's requirements for admission were more demanding than men's requirements in the beginning. When young men less academically endowed were being admitted into the University before their daughters, the alumni fathers cried out, Lane said. As a result, women were soon accepted on the same criteria as men.

In the overall structure of the University, 51 percent of students are females, Scott said. As for the faculty, 13 percent in academic affairs and 18 percent in health affairs are women.

These percentages are lower than the national average, Scott said. In the hierarchy of the administration, women are more numerous in the positions of lecturers, assistant professors and associate professors. In the higher administration positions, such as dean, vice chancellor, and chancellor, there are no women at all, Scott said.

A variety of female personality types are very important for female students to relate to, Scott said. Women faculty leaders are needed as role models. The advice of particular women in careers is important, because the problems women face are different from the problems men face, Scott said. There is no one in the alumni office with the special interest in the future careers of women or special additional training for women after graduation.

For those interested in occupations for women, information is available at Nash Hall.
