

Says training's worth it

Ireland a winner in the water

By BILL FIELDS
Sports Editor

When Ken Ireland walks into Howell Hall's editing lab at 8 every Tuesday and Thursday morning for Journalism 57, he has already had more exercise than most of the class will get that day.

He has also gotten wetter than any of the class will get, in chlorine-laced water at that.

Ireland's daily routine of rising with the roosters and swimming for an hour before most Carolina students have hit the "snooze button" for an extra bit of sleep, is nothing out of the ordinary for serious swimmers.

In Profile: Ken Ireland

The discipline required to succeed in what Ireland says high-level swimming is all about. "Basically what swimming teaches you is discipline," he says.

Discipline is a trait Ireland learned early, but not as soon as most competitive swimmers. While most of the top swimmers in his native Fort Lauderdale, Fla., began two-a-day practices at age 12 or 13, Ireland wasn't in the pool, but at the Little League diamond and other places until age 15.

He then decided—after seeing his older brother Shawn's swimming success—he wanted to take on swimming at full speed. The water hasn't been placid since.

Now a junior journalism major, the 20-year-old Ireland is one of the top performers on the North Carolina men's team. He was named Atlantic Coast Conference rookie of the year in '78, won the Most Outstanding Swimmer award in the '79 ACC championships and last month won two events in the ACCs.

Fittingly, for a swimmer, he enrolled at UNC after seriously considering the United States Naval Academy, an institution Ireland felt might have been too structured for him to concentrate as much as he wished on swimming.

"I was heavily recruited, but not by too many big swimming powers," he recalls. "The only super swimming power that recruited me was Florida. I came to Chapel Hill in April, and you know how nice April is. I loved the people and the place."

Even though he opted against the Naval Academy, Ireland is in UNC's Naval ROTC program, and Naval Flight school is in his post-Carolina plans. Eventually, Ireland wants to enter the commercial aviation field and do some freelance reporting as well.

But all that is in the future. For now, Ireland is looking towards next week's NCAA championships at Cambridge, Mass., where he'll compete in the 100- and 200-yard backstroke and in a relay.

Ireland's specialties are the 100 and 200 backstroke races

"The backstroke event is so tough that I would like to place in the top six in both backstrokes," he says. "Realistically, I have a shot at third or fourth in the 100. In the 200, anybody could win it; I could win it."

In the NCAA's, Ireland says he faces the most tension of any event he participates in. "There's a lot of tension and pressure. It's unlike anything I've ever experienced in my life. It's so thick. There are so many good swimmers there. It comes down to the mental part and team support."

Ireland says the mental aspect is the edge he holds over his competitors, even though it means being considered a little loony as people watch him psyche himself for a race.

"I've always taken pride in getting mentally tuned for the races and being mentally prepared," he says. "I guess I'm what they call a head case."

With all the emphasis Ireland places on the emotional phase of the sport, he remembers well when a mental ploy failed—and failed badly.

Ireland says he will never shave his head again for a race after the technique—which he said is as much mental as physical—backfired with him at last year's NCAA. "I was the No. 1 seed in my event, and to put it bluntly, I choked. I'll never shave (my head) again."

Now, with the chance of United States' participation in the summer Olympics almost gone, Ireland is watching a huge dream escape like the splashes out of a pool. But his regrets are few, even if he has been forced to give up choral singing and work in theatrical productions to concentrate on swimming—not to mention going to fewer parties. "I had very little social life in high school," he says.

But for Ireland, the sport has brought more than a dance and a dinner date could. "It's helped me become aware of my potential as a person and as an athlete."

Tar Heel Page Kennedy ...UNC in Duke event

Veteran-newcomer mesh keys UNC

No one could have blamed UNC baseball coach Mike Roberts if he had said that he dreaded the 1980 Carolina baseball season.

After all, Roberts lost six players who were good enough to get a shot at playing professional baseball. Among those who finished their Carolina careers last season were Roy Clark, Jim Atkinson, Greg Robinson and Greg Norris. If you want to know how important those guys were to Tar Heel baseball, take a look at the school's hitting and pitching records sometime.

But Roberts, in his typically optimistic manner, actually looked forward to the season in the months leading up to the first game. Some might have thought he needed a stay in a rubber room for that attitude, but it looks like Mike Roberts knew something those others did not.

After 21 games, Roberts has his team at 13-8 overall and, more important, 2-0 in the Atlantic Coast Conference. Carolina has two big road games in the ACC this weekend, at Virginia on Saturday and at Maryland Sunday, and two more league wins would put the Tar Heels in a very good position early in the race.

The secret to Carolina's relatively successful first month of the season has been the way that the new players have fit in with the veterans.

Take, for example, Carolina's win over Duke last Saturday. Junior college transfer Mark Ochal pitched a superb game, striking out 12 and leading the Heels to a 4-1 win.

Heel women tee off in Duke tournament

By LINDA ROBERTSON
Staff Writer

The UNC women's golf team, fresh from victories over Michigan State and Cincinnati, heads to Durham to compete in the Duke Spring Invitational tournament this weekend.

In a hurriedly-scheduled match, Michigan State and Cincinnati challenged Carolina to a three-team contest at Southern Pines Tuesday.

"The schools are down here for Spring Break and their coaches called me and asked if we wanted to play," said Coach Dot Gunnells.

The UNC squad responded with a 313 total to defeat MSU (348) and the Bearcats (377). Page Kennedy was medalist as her 77 was just ahead of teammate Carla Daniel's 78. Maren Long and Cathy Reynolds both carded 79's for the Tar Heels, and Linda Mescan's 83 completed Carolina's top five.

The win was a good tuneup for the tournament this weekend, according to Gunnells. "Everyone broke 80 at Pinehurst last Saturday in a little intrasquad match and we played real well against Michigan State and Cincinnati. I hope our performances this week are a good indication of how we'll do at Duke."

The five UNC women slated to go the three rounds at Duke are Janet Haire, Cathy Reynolds, Jill Nesbitt, Susan Cary and Stephanie Korngay.

The 17 team field will include national powers Georgia and Ohio State. Carolina finished third last year and was runner-up in 1978.

"It is spring vacation for a lot of schools so there will be a strong contingent from the East and Midwest, including Ohio State, Purdue and Penn State," said Gunnells. "We have a very evenly balanced team and look good going into the Duke Invitational."

The first round of the Furman Intercollegiate Golf Tournament for men's teams was rained out Thursday. North Carolina and several other teams will resume play in that tournament today. It is now scheduled to run 27 holes.

David Poole

Carolina fans have been chanting "J.R., J.R." for years now and the lanky left fielder remains a favorite with the suds-quaffing crowds at Boshamer Stadium.

Kumiega is one of the many new faces on the team who are forcing the veterans to perform well if they are to remain toward the top of UNC's offensive statistics.

Pete Kumiega was on a tear last week and Jim Palmer would have done well to get him out. He was 8-for-9 with five RBIs last weekend and hit a home run on Saturday that still may be going.

But Kumiega and Rouse are nothing close to a two-man team. It has been the ability of the Tar Heels to come up with a key hit or a good pitching performance at the right time—whether from a veteran or from a newcomer—that has been a big factor all season.

Carolina now moves into a tough stretch in its 1980 schedule, playing 11 games in nine days beginning next Tuesday. That will be followed by games at East Carolina, Clemson, Georgia Tech, South Carolina and Duke. That adds up to 18 games in the next 20 days. That can be murder, especially on the pitching staff, but Roberts has men he can call on to do the job.

If Carolina can come out of the next three weeks alive and still be toward the top of the ACC race, it may just be that Mike Roberts never had anything to be afraid of at all.
